DRAFT KIT

WELCOME

Welcome to our world—the Fantasy Source world. A world in which our dedicated staff works tirelessly to bring you all the information you need to build a winning fantasy basketball team.

What you have in your hands—Sporting News' Fantasy Basketball Draft Kit—will help you pick the best team in your league. It's a compilation of everything you need to dominate your competition during the upcoming season.

Here's just some of what you'll find:

- * Analysis of the league's top 200 players, with the latest on each player's expected roles this season. This analysis has the qualities of our top-rated player, Kevin Garnett: exciting and guaranteed to dominate.
- * Updated player rankings. We rank 'em all by position plus our Top 100 overall.
- * Projected statistics for the top 200 players in the league.
- * Updated team depth charts.
- * Updated injury news.
- * Updated transaction reports.
- * Team-by-team schedules.
- * A schedule grid that includes every team's total of week-by-week games.
- * All the statistics you will need to put our rankings in perspective and your team on top.

This Fantasy Basketball Draft Kit will be updated through the start of the season and includes unlimited downloads for a one-time charge of $9.99. Use the rankings to prepare for your draft and study the analysis to gain an added edge on your league rivals.

We're proud of this kit, but we know it isn't perfect. If you think of ideas that could improve it, please send them our way. Drop us an e-mail at fantasy@sportingnews.com.

Good luck with your fantasy season and, to make sure you have the competitive edge, keep coming back to visit us.

Sincerely,

Stan McNeal

TOMMY ADAMS, G - NYK

COURTNEY ALEXANDER, SG - NO

Alexander has shown he can be an explosive scorer in the sporadic bursts of playing time he has received in Washington and Dallas. Now that he'll at worst be the first guard off the bench for New Orleans, he could break out in a big way. And he's a better pick than David Wesley, the guy penciled in to start ahead of him. Make Alexander one of your last reserve picks in standard leagues, and he might end up being worth starting at a utility spot.

RAY ALLEN, SG - SEA

Allen seemed energized by last season's trade to Seattle, putting up numbers in several categories there that would have marked career highs in a full season. His style is more suited to the Western Conference, anyway, so Allen figures to continue posting some of the league's best shooting statistics—especially on 3s and free throw percentage.

RAFER ALSTON, PG - MIA

Alston is a playground legend who has shown moments of brilliance in the NBA but not enough consistency. Maybe a demanding coach, a little job security (Miami's only other point guard is Dwyane Wade, a rookie who played off guard in college) and his best opportunity yet to contribute as a pro are just what Alston needs. It probably isn't worth a draft pick in standard leagues to find out, but Alston should be watched in case he proves deserving of an in-season pickup.

DEREK ANDERSON, SG - POR

Anderson has been hurt often and is in a dicey situation in Portland, which is why he isn't ranked higher. He finished among the top 50 fantasy producers in the second half last season, but his role is unclear, and the Blazers are in transition. Even in a bad situation, though, he will be a solid No. 3 guard if he stays healthy.

RICK APODACA, G - ORL

PLAYER ANALYSIS/STATISTICS - GUARDS

GILBERT ARENAS, PG - WAS

Arenas is too young to have much of a track record, and now he is changing uniforms--a combination that makes him slightly risky. But a few things seem clear: No matter who is cutting his checks, he will be good for points, rebounds, assists and steals. His turnovers are a sore spot in some leagues, and his shooting percentages could be affected in Washington. The flip side: Arenas is only 21 (youngest in our top 25) and probably will continue to improve.

DARRELL ARMSTRONG, PG - NO

Armstrong has been headed toward regular reserve duty for the last couple of years, but his current situation is almost a worst-case scenario. Though New Orleans' starting point guard, Baron Davis, is a bit injury-prone, he plays lots of minutes when healthy. And new Hornets coach Tim Floyd probably will be reluctant to play the 6-1, 180-pound Armstrong alongside 6-1 shooting guard David Wesley. Armstrong is capable of positive value in six categories if he gets enough minutes, but that seems unlikely.

RON ARTEST, G/F - IND

Artest's borderline lunacy has put him on the hot seat. He will play, but it might not be in Indiana. No matter what uniform he is wearing, his antics will get him suspended and tossed from games too often. Injuries are an issue--mostly because he is so aggressive--but Artest is a steals hound and comes close to providing positive value in every category. He should remain a starter-caliber fantasy option.

CHUCKY ATKINS, PG - DET

Atkins is an efficient and prolific 3-point shooter, but his other numbers are average or worse. Moreover, his starting job now belongs to Chauncey Billups. Still, Atkins showed two years ago that he can be productive off the bench, so he might still have value in deeper leagues.

MARCUS BANKS, PG - BOS

New Celtics GM Danny Ainge, considered an astute judge of talent, was determined before June's draft to get Banks into a Boston uniform. Ainge made it happen, and now Banks is penciled in as the team's starting point guard. Even if Banks still needs polish running an offense, his quickness and scoring could make him a fantasy factor from the start. Expect points, assists and steals--but also lots of turnovers.

BRENT BARRY, SG - SEA

Barry had problems with knee tendinitis last season, which explains why most of his stats dropped from 2001-02. The presence of Ray Allen and lack of an experienced starting point guard means Barry likely will shoulder much of the playmaking duties, which is welcome news to fantasy owners. He should log more assists and, if healthy, get his shooting percentages back up among those of the game's best guards.

JON BARRY, SG - DEN

Barry, who often filled in at the point last year, will be hurt by Detroit's signing of Chauncey Billups more than any other Piston. Barry last season set or approached career highs in most categories -- including scoring, rebounding and assists -- mostly because he played more minutes than any other season in his career. Those minutes will be tougher to come by this season, but his shooting percentages and 3s will be worth something if he gets enough floor time.

SHANE BATTIER, G/F - MEM

Hoops purists and fantasy geeks alike love Battier, a hustler who racks up steals and blocks and who makes a difference in other categories despite limited ability. Trouble is, Battier isn't quite big enough, and the Grizzlies have a ton of options at the wing positions. If projected starters Mike Miller and James Posey and former starters Michael Dickerson and Wesley Person all are healthy, Battier could be left out in the cold.

TRAVIS BEST, PG - DAL

Best will play point guard for the Heat, but he is more shooter than playmaker. Still, now that Alonzo Mourning appears to be done at least for the season, Miami will need scoring from wherever it can get it, so this could be a good fit. Best isn't much of a 3-point threat, but he is a good shooter from the floor and the free-throw line, and brings enough assists and steals to the table to be a valuable fantasy reserve.

MIKE BIBBY, PG - SAC

Bibby missed 27 games because of a foot injury last season—a relatively small concern because he came back OK and because he missed just two games the previous three seasons. But he is limited by the Kings' equal-opportunity offense, which helps Bibby to strong percentages but leaves him with ordinary points and assists totals.

CHAUNCEY BILLUPS, PG - DET

Think Sam Cassell Lite. Billups is a shooting guard trapped in a point guard's body, which is OK with the Pistons, as long as he keeps scoring. Because most of Billups' other stats are average or below par for his position (especially assists), his value comes mostly from 3-point and free throw shooting. But his assists and field-goal percentage should rise if Detroit finds inside help. Darko anyone?

Boykins signed a long-term contract with Denver in the offseason, which shows just how hard up the Nuggets are for help. Boykins is a nice little player—with the operative word being "little." He is a savvy scorer and playmaker, and can be productive in short bursts. But his size makes him a huge liability on defense and, as a result, a poor candidate to earn enough playing time to amount to solid long-term fantasy value.

TERRELL BRANDON, PG - ATL

Brandon's health and mind-set have been in question the last few years, but there aren't any doubts about his game. The most positive development for him is that he again is the undisputed starter in Minnesota now that Chauncey Billups is gone. If Brandon is injury-free, his scoring, assists and steals could make him a top-10 point guard. But that's a big "if."

KOBE BRYANT, SG - LAL

Bryant was last season's top fantasy scorer under our format, so why isn't he the obvious No. 1 choice this year? Let us count the reasons: (1) He is a shooting guard--the game's easiest position to fill; (2) he is coming off shoulder surgery; (3) Gary Payton and Karl Malone will steal some of his stats; (4) legal issues. (Although no one knows when the legal woes will come into play.) Still, if he is on the floor, Bryant is one of the best. And last season he eliminated the final statistical weak spot in his game: the 3-pointer.

Carter's Q-rating is way down these days, which means you might be able to grab him with a bargain pick. He has missed 61 games in the last two years because of injuries, so he doesn't come without risk. But the reward could be immense. Carter's career averages all bear positive values in a standard roto league and would give him close to first-round worth in an 80-game season.

SAM CASSELL, PG - MIN

Cassell is a steady scoring point guard who will fit right in with the T-wolves, whose offense runs through Kevin Garnett. Cassell's shooting percentages--excellent during his four-year stay in Milwaukee--should remain top-notch. Everything else should be status quo, too, but at his age (34 in November), Cassell's history of nagging injuries is worrisome.

DOUG CHRISTIE, SG - SAC

Christie's scoring--never a strong suit--was down last season. But most of the rest of his numbers were close to or better than his career averages, and he even set personal bests in field-goal percentage and assists. Steals are his best asset, but he does everything well enough to merit starting in standard leagues.

SPEEDY CLAXTON, PG - GS

Claxton is a wild card because Nick Van Exel is even wilder. Will Van Exel pack it in now that he's on a non-contender again? Will he even stay in Golden State? No one is sure how Claxton would handle more playing time, let alone the role of a full-time starter. But we have seen enough of him--assists, steals, strong enough shooting numbers--to believe he is worth a flier in most leagues.

JAMAL CRAWFORD, PG - CHI

Crawford suddenly is Chicago's undisputed starting point guard and a potential star. He played like a poor man's Steve Francis in the second half last season and averaged 23.0 points, 6.5 assists and 2.3 3s in April. Crawford's stats will be somewhat dependent on the development of Tyson Chandler and Eddy Curry, but he projects as a fantasy starter in any scenario.

ANTONIO DANIELS, PG - SEA

Daniels mostly has disappointed since he was selected fourth overall in the 1997 draft, but he also hasn't had many opportunities to prove folks wrong since his rookie year. This season, on a Sonics' club with no other experienced true point guard, might be his best chance yet. Daniels must split time with Brent Barry, but a fairly prominent role on an up-tempo team that really needs his help could be the spark he needs. If things break right for him, points, assists, steals and solid all-around shooting numbers will follow.

MARQUIS DANIELS, G - DAL

BARON DAVIS, PG - NO

Davis, an on-the-cusp fantasy star a year ago, seems far less attractive now. He missed 32 games last season because of back and knee troubles, and though he raised his free throw percentage, his overall marksmanship still is a problem. That said, his combination of scoring, assists, 3s and steals makes him a good starting option.

EMANUAL DAVIS, PG - ATL

Davis was Atlanta's starting point guard heading into last season, but it was his size (6-5) and defense that interested the Hawks more than anything else. He suffered a wrist injury that cost him most of the season, and now he'll have to battle the likes of Dion Glover, Dan Dickau and Ira Newble for playing time in the backcourt. At any rate, it's doubtful he'll be worth a roster spot even in deep leagues.

RICKY DAVIS, G/F - CLE

Davis became a starter-caliber fantasy guard when he began stroking the 3 and setting up teammates last season. But could the arrival of LeBron James and coach Paul Silas knock him back down a notch or three? Not likely. The Cavs need scoring and playmaking in the worst way, and Davis can be counted on for both. Just beware of those shooting percentages.

CARLOS DELFINO, G/F - DET

TONY DELK, PG - BOS

It's the same old, same old for Delk: He's a shooting guard trapped in a point guard's body. GM Danny Ainge considers Delk to be a 2, but Delk won't get much time there behind Paul Pierce and the Celtics need more help at point guard. In any case, Delk is far more likely to provide points, 3s and steals than assists. His field-goal shooting will be a drag, and his role in Boston seems unclear.

BORIS DIAW-RIFFIOD, G/F - ATL

Diaw isn't a ready-made NBA scorer, but he is a good fit for the Hawks and will contribute immediately in other areas. Because Jason Terry essentially is an undersized shooting guard, Diaw, an exceptional passer at 6-9, can help as a distributor and defending opposing 2s. Diaw is young and has questionable aggressiveness, but the Hawks' dearth of alternatives in the backcourt means he should get minutes right away. A deep sleeper.

DAN DICKAU, G - ATL

Dickau is a fantastic shooter with amazing range, but there are doubts about whether he can play defense in the NBA. At worst, he figures to be another Steve Kerr, though Dickau is a better athlete and is more of a scorer than just a shooter. He's in a pinch, though, because the Hawks don't want to play him and Jason Terry together often (for defensive purposes), which means his minutes could be limited. Depending on how things shake down during the season, he might be worth a waiver-wire grab.

He missed all but four games last season because of a leg injury, and Memphis has added talent since then, but Dickerson could end up being worthy of a starting spot on your fantasy roster if he is healthy. He says he is. Either way, he is a nice sleeper pick.

MIKE DUNLEAVY, G/F - GS

Dunleavy showed signs of life at the end of his rookie season, and the Warriors sent a clear message when they traded Antawn Jamison to Dallas: Dunleavy will play. But how will he play? He still is physically underdeveloped, but Dunleavy did get stronger in the offseason and his outside game and guard skills will lead to good 3-point and assist numbers--valuable stuff from a forward. His field-goal shooting probably will remain below average until he gets stronger.

DANNY EARL, G - NJN

HOWARD EISLEY, PG - NYK

Eisley enjoyed a career year in his eighth NBA season, and he did it with a Knicks club whose pieces didn't fit quite right and that didn't have any inside game to speak of. If rookie forwards Mike Sweetney and Maciej Lampe come through or Antonio McDyess somehow makes a healthy return--true, lots of "ifs"--the perimeter should open up for Eisley, a strong 3-point shooter, and assists will abound. Still, he belongs at the back end of fantasy drafts.

MICHAEL FINLEY, G/F - DAL

Once a rock of reliability, Finley has missed 13 games in each of the last two seasons. He still is in his prime, and his stats are sterling when he is healthy. The Mavs have a loaded roster, but Finley has no direct competition for minutes, and his status as team leader probably will ensure he won't lose many touches. If he stays healthy, his preseason ranking will prove low.

T.J. FORD, PG - MIL

Ford's playmaking skills already are at an elite level, but his shaky jumper will allow NBA defenders to play off him and negate his blink-and-I'm-gone first step. The Bucks are ready to live or die with Ford as their starting point guard, which means playing time won't be a problem. Unfortunately, everything else will be. Milwaukee might have the least talent in the league this side of Utah, so most of Ford's numbers won't be what they could be. Assists and steals--premium roto stats--will be an asset, but Ford's shooting and turnovers (in some leagues) will make it a wash.

STEVE FRANCIS, G - HOU

Don't be surprised if the coaching change in Houston has an effect on Francis' numbers. The bet here is that Stevie Franchise still will duck into a phone booth from time to time and emerge as Stevie Freelance, but Jeff Van Gundy figures to run a tighter ship than Rudy Tomjanovich. Francis' scoring might shrink, but it could be a net gain for his owners, who will enjoy more assists, better shooting percentages and fewer turnovers.

REECE GAINES, G - ORL

Orlando signed free agent Tyronn Lue in the offseason, presumably in order to ease Gaines into the starting point guard job. If Gaines shows an early aptitude for the playmaker role, that process could be accelerated. But he played the point for only one season at Louisville and has more of a scorer's mentality at this point. He probably isn't draft-worthy in standard leagues, but keep a close eye on his development during the season. He could catch on by the second half.

EMANUEL GINOBILI, SG - SA

An adjustment period and an ankle injury kept Ginobili from getting up to speed until late in his rookie season. But after he did, oh, mama! He was a factor in all of the traditional guard categories in the second half (especially steals) and showed considerable promise as a scorer and playmaker.

Giricek is a dead-eye shooter and a potential No. 2 scorer behind Tracy McGrady in Orlando, yet he's no Euro softy. He is a much better rebounder than he might appear to be, and his assists and steals climbed after his midseason trade from Memphis. He has seven-category potential.

DION GLOVER, G/F - ATL

Glover has lots of issues: He's a 'twener, he's injury-prone, he's stuck in a playing-time competition with Emanuel Davis, Ira Newble and, indirectly, rookie point guard Dan Dickau. That said, Glover was great during summer league play and can be productive if he stays healthy and gets a chance. That's a lot of ifs, though. You probably can wait to pick him up as a free agent in most standard leagues.

JUSTIN HAMILTON, G - DET

RICHARD HAMILTON, G/F - DET

Hamilton wins the booby prize for worst fantasy player among the league's top scorers. He is a gifted midrange shooter, but there isn't much else to his game, making him little more than a two-category player. Unless he puts a charge into his 3-point shooting, Hamilton has little fantasy upside.

TRAVIS HANSEN, SG - ATL

ANFERNEE HARDAWAY, SG - PHO

Hardaway's small forward size and point guard ability still create mismatches and give fantasy owners an eight-category threat. But at age 32 and with all sorts of knee troubles in his past, Hardaway is a decidedly less prolific player. He now is no more than the Suns' fourth-best player, and Joe Johnson might soon knock Penny down another rung. Grab Hardaway as your fourth guard and you won't be disappointed.

LUCIOUS HARRIS, SG - NJN

Jason Kidd didn't just boost Harris' game -- he also did wonders for his confidence. Harris is now an integral part of the Nets' bench brigade, so he figures to continue to be moderately productive and have some fantasy value. But the development of Richard Jefferson and arrival of Rodney Rogers and Chris Childs probably will eat into his touches and minutes.

TRENTON HASSELL, SG - CHI

If Hassell plays, he'll be a rock-solid fantasy reserve. The Bulls love his defense, and his all-around offensive game obviously is sound, so there's no reason to think he'll fall off the map. But Chicago actually has some players this season, so Hassell won't play as large a role -- and probably will get stuck with fewer minutes.

JARVIS HAYES, G/F - WAS

Hayes doesn't stand out in any one area, but he seems to have all the requisite skills of an NBA swingman. He is a good but not great shooter, and he is more athletic than your average spot-up guy. His size (6-7, 220) will come in handy at the 2, though the presence of Jerry Stackhouse means he probably will get most of his minutes at small forward. Hayes probably isn't rookie of the year material, but a combination of talent and opportunity could make him viable, especially in deeper leagues.

ALLAN HOUSTON, SG - NYK

Houston, one of the best pure shooters in the game, has become a more complete all-around scorer in recent years. He posted career highs in scoring and free throw attempts per game last season, and his shooting percentages remained strong. His rebounds and steals are weak spots, but he makes up for that with durability and consistency.

PLAYER ANALYSIS/STATISTICS - GUARDS

JOSH HOWARD, G/F - DAL

Howard was a low first-rounder and has been blown off by many fantasy owners already because Dallas is loaded with plenty of skilled, more experienced players. But Howard is a good defender and athletic enough to create his own offense and be a factor on the boards. He could do for the Mavs what Adrian Griffin did a year ago, only do it more productively. A deep sleeper.

TROY HUDSON, PG - MIN

Hudson was good in the second half and fantastic in the playoffs last season, but can he possibly be as productive in 2003-04 with Sam Cassell (not to mention Latrell Sprewell and Michael Olowokandi) in the Twin Cities? Probably not. Hudson has proved he can put up scoring numbers off the bench, though, so expect him to be one of the league's top sixth men--not as valuable as fantasy owners would have hoped, but good for a utility or top bench spot.

LARRY HUGHES, PG - WAS

Remember a time when Hughes was a burgeoning talent with Golden State? It seems like eons ago, but it was as recently as 1999 that Hughes averaged 22.7 points in a 32-game stretch for the Warriors. Though his overall numbers have fallen off drastically since then, here are two reasons to be hopeful: (1) Last season he brought his field-goal and three-point shooting percentages up significantly, and (2) he is only 24. If anyone ever stops worrying about what position he plays and just lets him hoop, he could put up above-average numbers almost across the board.

ALLEN IVERSON, SG - PHI

The perception is that Iverson had a bounce-back season in 2002-03, but the truth is most of his numbers were down or were little better than in previous seasons. The difference: He stayed healthy for a full slate of games for the first time in his seven-year career. He is slight and plays with a swashbuckling style that gets him battered, so don't bet on an 82-game repeat. Iverson is a great asset, but don't overestimate his value, especially in turnover leagues.

BOBBY JACKSON, G - SAC

Jackson was a madman in the first half of last season, nearly cracking the top 10 of overall fantasy scorers. But Mike Bibby's return sent B-Jax into a statistical freefall from which he probably won't bounce back. There just aren't enough minutes or shots to go around in Sacramento for everyone to land on the leaderboard, so Jackson will have to be satisfied with his sixth-man duties and his also-ran fantasy status. File it away, though: If something opens up for him, we know he can do the job.

PLAYER ANALYSIS/STATISTICS - GUARDS

JIM JACKSON, G/F - HOU

Jackson will be playing for some NBA team and will be moderately productive -- certainly enough so to be worth playing at a utility spot in many leagues. But he has averaged just 60 games the last four seasons and could see his numbers dramatically affected depending on where he lands. He just isn't all that safe.

MARK JACKSON, PG - UTH

Jackson isn't great anymore, but depending on how things shake down for him, he could have some fantasy value left. He has been remarkably durable in his career, and his production -- assists in particular -- will be a nice asset if he gets enough minutes. But at 37, it's more likely he'll end up a backup, in which case his value would probably be limited to insurance for the guy starting ahead of him.

STEPHEN JACKSON, G/F - ATL

Jackson emerged as a force on the floor and in fantasy play last season, but how much of it should be credited to the Spurs? Will he remain as effective, or even produce more, in a new environment? Those questions kept him out of the TSN top 100, but Jackson's three-point shooting and steals potential are worth a roster spot--probably that of a top reserve--in every league. With enough minutes and better shot selection, he should at least hold his own in every category but blocks.

LEBRON JAMES, G/F - CLE

He might be King James, but LeBron still has dues to pay in the NBA. His 3-point shot is a work in progress, and he could have turnover issues. Yet James also could put up an interesting combination of numbers (points, assists and steals) and probably will qualify at guard and forward.

MARKO JARIC, G/F - LAC

Jaric had an up-and-down rookie season, but he showed enough to prove he's deserving of a shot at a starting job. In 12 starts last year, he averaged 12.4 points, 3.5 rebounds and 4.0 assists. With Andre Miller gone, Jaric will be asked to be more of a playmaker than scorer in his new role, so his assists should rise, and at 6-7, he will be one of the league's best rebounding point guards. If Jaric's shot keeps coming around, the sky's the limit. He's a top sleeper.

JOE JOHNSON, G/F - PHO

Johnson went on a binge over the final week of last season, then disappeared in the playoffs--a stretch fairly representative of his young NBA career. There is little doubt Johnson can be an above-average fantasy producer in every category but blocks, but can he do it regularly? And how soon? Remember, he still is a pup (just 22) and would have been a rookie this season if he had stayed four years at Arkansas. His value is highest in category leagues, but he should be ready to fill a top reserve role and perhaps start in all standard-depth fantasy leagues.

EDDIE JONES, SG - MIA

When Jones isn't on the trainer's table, his all-around skills make him one of fantasy's best guards. Trouble is, he has missed 55 games in the last three seasons. Also, Heat coach Pat Riley has stifled his game a bit (though that might change if Riley remains as reflective about his style as he has been this offseason). In any case, at his position, Jones' value is good to excellent in every category except field-goal percentage.

FRED JONES, G/F - IND

Jones, the Pacers' first-round pick (No. 14 overall), is an insane leaper and a pretty fair shooter, but he had only one truly outstanding college season and doesn't have anywhere to play. Minutes at shooting guard behind Reggie Miller will be scarce, and though the Pacers say Jones can play the point, the team already has another promising young player there: Jamaal Tinsley. Only gamble on Jones with one of your last picks in a very deep league.

JASON KIDD, PG - NJN

Though his dismal field-goal percentages are a chink in his armor, Kidd is as good as it gets among true point guards. Because assists and steals--Kidd fortés--are premium categories and because big rebounding numbers from a point guard spot are rare, Kidd's scoring and 3-point shooting are just gravy. Knock him down to a second-rounder in turnover leagues.

and he is just a cog in the Nets' hard-charging machine of an offense. His scoring also could be sacrificed as the team makes way for Alonzo Mourning. In spite of it all, Kittles has been among the league's steadiest performers over the last three seasons, and though it isn't quite starter value, fantasy owners know what they're getting from him: positive value in all eight categories

RAUL LOPEZ, G - UTH

Know this about Lopez right away: He has had two reconstructive knee surgeries since the Jazz selected him in the first round in 2001. If you can get past that, you might have a player on your hands. Lopez, who has plenty of international experience, should be more level-headed than most first-year NBA players. He also is a bona fide game manager who is fast and creative. His jumper still needs work, but Lopez probably is the best option the Jazz have at the point, so expect him to earn minutes immediately.

TYRONN LUE, PG - ORL

Lue is too small to ever have big-time value (low rebounds, blocks and field-goal percentages), but he isn't a bad fantasy player when he gets enough floor time. He started to come on after the All-Star break last season, and that should carry over through at least the early stretch of 2003-04. Lue, who has the most to offer in the assists, free-throw shooting and 3s categories, could have top 100 value as the Magic's starting point guard. But that will last only as long as it takes rookie Reece Gaines to get his feet wet.

Magloire isn't special, but he is strong in two categories (rebounding and field-goal percentage) and gets the job done in two others (points and blocks). He never will be a force because his offensive game is limited, but he could put up the sort of numbers fantasy owners received from Dale Davis in Davis' prime.

COREY MAGGETTE, G/F - LAC

Maggette needs to stay healthy (50 missed games in the last three years), but he has the talent--and now the opportunity--to become a very good starting fantasy guard. He went from possibly being the Clippers' fifth-best scoring option to No. 2, behind Elton Brand. If he avoids injury and keeps honing his outside shot, Maggette could become a top 50 fantasy player in roto and points formats alike.

STEPHON MARBURY, PG - PHO

For a player considered a bit of a loose cannon early in his career and who still is a streaky outside shooter, Marbury has put up remarkably consistent numbers the past five years. He offers prototypical point guard stats and ranks among the league's elite scorers. It would be nice to see his 3-point shooting percentage go up and his turnovers go down, but Marbury's game otherwise has few holes.

DESMOND MASON, G/F - MIL

Mason is stuck in a bad spot. Milwaukee is a bad club that can't afford to waste its best talent, but neither can it afford to start a career 27.8-percent 3-point shooter next to a rookie point guard (T.J. Ford) who could be much worse from that range--especially when the Bucks can go to Michael Redd (43.8 on 3s last year) instead. Mason will play and put up good, and in some cases very good, numbers in most categories. But if you're looking for a breakthrough season, it won't happen unless the Bucks make a trade.

GEORGE MCCLOUD, G/F - GS

McCloud is getting up there in years, and considering he isn't exactly a picture of physical fitness, he might find his decline faster than others on the down side. He'll play at first for sure, but there are too many young players in Denver with at least a little promise for McCloud to be simply taking up space for long. He'll have a little value early on and if someone gets hurt, but in most leagues you'd be better off drafting a kid with potential.

TRACY MCGRADY, SG - ORL

Instead of bowing under the pressure of carrying a team, McGrady proved last season that he can and will put up numbers, even in the toughest conditions. T-Mac led the league in scoring and maintained his all-around brilliance despite having a subpar supporting cast. He misses a handful of games every year, and his blocks have dropped off lately. Big boosts in scoring and 3-pointers have helped offset those losses.

JEFF MCINNIS, PG - POR

McInnis was awful last season, but he stands a pretty fair chance to bounce back. Damon Stoudamire's cap figure and recreational activities are quickly getting him phased out of the Blazers' plans, and McInnis is a more willing playmaker and less of a defensive liability than Stoudamire. McInnis, a top 100 fantasy player two years ago, has five-category potential if Portland allows him to show it.

TERRELL MCINTYRE, PG - NO

AARON MCKIE, G/F - PHI

McKie began last season on a tear, but his effectiveness gradually waned. With noted defense superfreak Larry Brown having left town, how will McKie's role change? Does the acquisition of Glenn Robinson kill his value? Our take: McKie will earn minutes because he can play three positions and is a defensive stopper, but his role will be diminished. That marginalized his value from solid utility guy or bench bandito to back-of-the-roster fantasy player.

ANTONIO MEEKING, G - MIL

RON MERCER, G/F - SA

Mercer is a better-than-average scorer who isn't much of a defender or outside shooter. He has also been snakebit by injuries and bad situations in Boston, Denver and Chicago. He could be a nice scorer off the bench if things break right for him in Indiana this season, but he is injury-prone and most of his numbers are nothing special -- or are just plain bad. And there usually is a reason a player of his talent gets shuttled from team to team. Don't count on him.

DARIUS MILES, G/F - CLE

Miles hasn't panned out the way the Cavs had hoped when they traded away Andre Miller to the Clippers before the start of last season. Still, it's easy to forget that Miles is only 22. He must add bulk and sharpen his shot if he ever is to make good on his status as a former No. 3 pick, but his length and athleticism will ensure that he produces as a rebounder and shot blocker. On a Cleveland roster that is much improved over last season's, Miles must stay healthy and show improvement or risk losing minutes.

ANDRE MILLER, PG - DEN

Miller did very little last season to earn this spot, but we've seen him at his best--and this ranking doesn't do his best justice. Under less pressure and with the security of a new contract, Miller should go back to being an All-Star-caliber point guard and triple-double threat.

MIKE MILLER, G/F - MEM

As frustrating as he can be to fantasy owners, Miller is wonderfully productive when healthy and in a favorable situation. He might have found one in Memphis, where he shot 50 percent or better from the floor and on 3s after his midseason trade from Orlando last year. If the Grizzlies can get his contract extension done before the season, it could further ease Miller's mind.

REGGIE MILLER, SG - IND

Miller, coming off his least productive season since his rookie year, definitely is in the twilight of his career. He still has some daggers left, though, and as long as he is playing, his 3-point and free-throw shooting will be strong assets. His other numbers, particularly his scoring, have dipped to the point that he no longer deserves a starting spot in most leagues, but he will be among the best fantasy reserves at his position.

CUTTINO MOBLEY, SG - HOU

Mobley is a second-tier scoring guard who might find himself bumped down another level unless he is traded. It's no secret the Rockets aren't altogether pleased with their backcourt-oriented offense, and Steve Francis isn't going anywhere. Mobley probably will have to sacrifice more shot attempts to Yao Ming, though his assist numbers might improve for a second straight season.

STEVE NASH, PG - DAL

Last season, Nash ranked in the top 10 in assists, 3-point percentage, free throw percentage and assist-to-turnover ratio. It's reasonable to expect Nash to produce roughly the same numbers, especially since he won't be losing minutes to traded Nick Van Exel has been moved. Nash's per-minute value last season was through the roof, but he needs to be on the floor more to move up our rankings.

IRA NEWBLE, G/F - CLE

Newble is mostly a defensive stopper, but he had a few short stretches in which he was quite productive for the Hawks last season. He could make a run at the starting shooting guard job, but, barring injuries, he probably won't play a ton of minutes. If he does, he'll provide the most help in the rebounding and shooting categories.

Norris had fine value as a reserve last season, but mostly because he played more than expected while Steve Francis dealt with migraine problems. If he gets comparable time this season, he'll give owners all the numbers they'd expect from a very good backup point guard.

TONY PARKER, PG - SA

Parker is coming off a pressure-packed season that he handled remarkably well for a young second-year player from another country. With Jason Kidd safely halfway across the country, Parker should continue to grow. His 3-point shooting, assists and steals all have room for improvement, but his size will keep him from ever doing much in the rebounds and blocks categories. He has better value in points leagues.

RUBEN PATTERSON, G/F - POR

Patterson could be a decent fantasy asset if he played more and had any outside game to speak of, but don't look for either of those in the near future. The Blazers might have rid themselves of Shawn Kemp, but they went out and got Jeff McInnis and Antonio Daniels, and brought back Arvydas Sabonis. Even if those guys don't directly affect Patterson's minutes, the end result will be less floor time and fewer touches.

GP will be well off in his new digs, but he and the Lakers are a less than perfect fit for fantasy owners. Payton is incredibly durable, but his 3-point shooting has tailed off in recent seasons, and his free throw clip was way down last season. His new role (third or fourth scoring option) and advancing age (35) have pushed him significantly closer to risky status.

ANTHONY PEELER, SG - SAC

Peeler will fill the role Jim Jackson served for the Kings a season ago, though he probably will do it better. Peeler is at least as good a shooter as Jackson, and a better defender. That will earn him minutes, and the easy buckets and infectious passing vibe that are part of Kings basketball could translate to better shooting percentages and more assists for Peeler. Not a bad end-of-the-bench option.

MORRIS PETERSON, G/F - TOR

Peterson hasn't developed as the Raptors had hoped, and he has been the subject of trade rumors off and on in the last year. The uncertainty of that situation alone makes him a bit dicey for fantasy owners. But if he can settle into a more complementary role on a healthier club, his numbers--particularly his weak field-goal percentage--should improve. He's a solid pick at the tail end of drafts because he has starter value in deeper leagues when he isn't asked to do too much.

ERIC PIATKOWSKI, G/F - HOU

Piatkowski is often overlooked -- even on his own team -- but he will have fantasy value if injuries hit the Clippers' backcourt. His 3-pointers are his best asset, though he is also one of the game's best all-around shooters. He isn't worth drafting in most leagues, but you'll know where to turn if Quentin Richardson or Corey Maggette are injured.

PAUL PIERCE, SG - BOS

Pierce apparently is suffering from Antoine Walker disease, which causes the afflicted to compulsively launch shots without conscience. That led to huge drops in his shooting percentages last season, though Pierce did manage to acquit himself somewhat by posting career highs in rebounds and assists. At any rate, those percentages are a lot more likely to go up than any further down.

MICKAEL PIETRUS, G/F - GS

SCOTTIE PIPPEN, G/F - CHI

Does Pippen have anything left in the tank? Can he stay healthy? Was he brought back to Chicago to contribute or for a feel-good farewell tour? That the questions must be asked indicate Pippen isn't the sure thing he was for fantasy owners a few years ago, but it's worth mentioning that last season he turned in positive value in every category but blocks. He still can be one of the NBA's better all-around threats, and could be starter-caliber in some leagues if he stays healthy.

JAMES POSEY, G/F - MEM

Posey is a defensive specialist with enough offensive game to stick his nose into a fantasy starting lineup here and there. Though he moved from a playoff contender to a lottery team in the offseason, one could argue that the Grizzlies collectively have as much offensive talent as the Rockets did a year ago. Posey probably won't get many more scoring opportunities, but he should earn more minutes and possibly get back to the top 100 territory he occupied during his best days in Denver.

MICHAEL REDD, SG - MIL

Redd, one of last season's biggest surprises, is better off with Ray Allen gone from Milwaukee, though that hardly makes him a sure thing. Redd slowed down in the second half last season (after Allen was traded and Desmond Mason was added), but his accuracy easily was the best among players who averaged at least two 3s. Even if he isn't as good as last season (which may be tough with a Bucks squad on which he suddenly is a marked man), Redd will have borderline starter value.

JASON RICHARDSON, SG - GS

Richardson didn't make the sort of jump fantasy owners were looking for last season, though he recovered slightly in the second half. His shooting is coming along, but there still is plenty of room for improvement. Richardson is only 22 and, after the Warriors' offseason roster overhaul, will get a chance to fill the team's stats void. With better shot selection, he could become a top fantasy guard.

QUENTIN RICHARDSON, SG - LAC

For fantasy owners, there is more to like than dislike about Richardson's game. He gets out-quickened on defense by some of the league's speedier shooting guards, which probably is a main reason he usually has come off the bench and earned limited minutes in the past. But all of Q's potential competition for playing time has similar or worse deficiencies. His scoring, rebounding, 3s and steals, projected in roughly 10 minutes more per game (and assuming his shooting numbers bounce back), is the stuff of a fantasy starter.

Rose runs hot and cold, and his shooting percentages can be ugly. But he does plenty to make up for it, including flourishing in four categories. Even if he must sacrifice some scoring as the Bulls' youngsters mature, the team's improved balance and inside play should help bolster Rose's percentages—a better-than-even trade.

BRYON RUSSELL, G/F - LAL

Russell figures to be the Wizards' starting small forward, and though he'll miss playing with John Stockton and Karl Malone, he still should be relatively productive. He offers a little bit in every category, but his most significant contributions will be points, rebounds and 3-pointers. He missed a good chunk of games last season because of a hip fracture and has had a few injury problems in the past, but he isn't what you would call injury-prone. FANTASY SPIN: Russell is a pretty good sleeper, because he never has been anything more than a No. 3 option -- and usually a No. 4 -- on some pretty good Jazz teams. He might boost his numbers in Washington, where he will be counted on more heavily.

KENNY SATTERFIELD, PG - WAS

There's a pretty good chance Satterfield, a second-year player, will go into the season as the Nuggets' starting point guard, which makes him a sleeper. Leaving school after one year to enter the NBA probably hurt his development, but all is not lost. He looked fantastic running the show in summer league play (3-to-1 assist-to-turnover ratio) and is a good enough shooter, if not a great one. Don't draft him in standard leagues, but track his progress in case he breaks out.

Smith faded in the second half last season and, at 33, certainly is on the downside of his career. He should continue to have excellent shooting numbers, but age and the presence of touted rookie Emmanuel Ginobili are working against Smith.

ERIC SNOW, PG - PHI

Most Y-league players have a better-looking outside jumper than Snow, which is why his scoring and field-goal and 3-point percentages stay pretty low. But he is great in some of the premium categories (assists, steals) and is a good rebounder for his position. He also commits very few turnovers for a point guard, which is important in some leagues.

LATRELL SPREWELL, G/F - MIN

Sprewell was a bad fit in New York, where he played out of position. Even so, he was quite good in four categories, held his own in most others and has shown the capacity to put up better numbers than he managed last season. A trade to Minnesota might keep him from scoring as he has in the past, but it should help his percentages and perhaps inspire him to refocus on his defense, which once put Sprewell among the most productive players at his position in steals and blocks.

Stackhouse's fantasy stock has taken a dive in the past two years; his scoring and 3-point shooting have tanked in a big way. He still is an explosive scorer, a good free throw shooter and a nice source of assists from the shooting guard spot. But will Michael Jordan's retirement open the door for Stack to fatten up his numbers again--or just make it harder?

JON STEFANSSON, G - DAL

DESHAWN STEVENSON, SG - UTH

This should be the season we find out whether or not Stevenson is an NBA player. Drafted out of high school in 2000, he has been buried on a veteran team. His jumper still hasn't come around, but coach Jerry Sloan has little choice but to play him and see what happens. Sometimes young players thrive in those situations, so consider Stevenson--who seems most promising in the points, steals and assists categories--a deep sleeper.

DAMON STOUDAMIRE, PG - POR

Stoudamire's run in Portland has been a spectacular failure, and it might be over soon. Management has pledged to clean up the team image, and Stoudamire's drug busts are becoming rather too routine. They'd like to move him, but his high-dollar contract is a big deterrent. Stoudamire's resurgence in the playoffs (15.3 ppg, 5.1 rpg, 5.6 apg) show that the game is there. Wherever he winds up, he will have value, but it will hinge greatly on his playing time and whether he behaves himself.

ERICK STRICKLAND, SG - MIL

By now, Strickland has proven he deserves a semi-prominent role in this league. But do the Pacers have on for him? Not really. Jamaal Tinsley is their starting point guard, and the team would like to work in rookie Freddie Jones at the position as well. Strickland will play, but probably not enough to be worth drafting. Keep an eye on him in case injuries strike.

BOB SURA, SG - DET

Something significant -- say, a trade or injury -- will have to happen for Sura to have near the value he did a season ago. The emergence of Jason Richardson and Gilbert Arenas, and the arrival of draft picks Mike Dunleavy Jr., Steve Logan and Jiri Welsch mean he is yesterday's news -- and a risky fantasy pick.

WALLY SZCZERBIAK, G/F - MIN

Szczerbiak is among the NBA's best shooters, and his percentages reflect that. Most of his other numbers are at least solid, but it's worth considering what effect the Timberwolves' offseason changes could have on his scoring. Even if his numbers dip, Szczerbiak should remain an above-average starting option. Last season's toe injury looks like a fluke, not the start of a trend.

PLAYER ANALYSIS/STATISTICS - GUARDS

JASON TERRY, G - ATL

Terry regularly is overlooked on draft day, and his value now is higher than ever. He became more of a true point guard last season, boosting his assists (a premium category) while losing little elsewhere. The Hawks are in flux, and it's hard to know if, or how, Terry's numbers will be affected, but the trade of Glenn Robinson can only help. Still, he has delivered despite big changes before. Nudge him down a few notches in turnover leagues.

JAMAAL TINSLEY, PG - IND

Basically a two-category player, Tinsley nevertheless has value because he ranks among the league leaders in assists and steals--tough stats for fantasy owners to come by. He is a horrible shooter and defender, and his minutes have been inconsistent as a result, but the Pacers' new regime is on his side. That should help his confidence and secure his spot in the lineup. Just don't look for a spike in fantasy value until Tinsley improved his marksmanship.

HEDO TURKOGLU, G/F - SA

Injuries and inconsistent playing time have stunted Turkoglu's progress in the NBA, but this season could be a breakout year for him. His trade to the Spurs virtually assures him of 30 minutes a game, during which he could be at least moderately productive in five categories.

NICK VAN EXEL, PG - GS

Van Exel is explosive--and not always in a good way. He was not a fan of the offseason trade that sent him from Dallas to Golden State, and there is concern that his attitude will affect his play. Perhaps, but Van Exel was at least as productive in 3 1-2 seasons with a bad Nuggets team as he had been before or since. And whereas he came off the bench and was playing fewer than 30 minutes a game with the Mavericks, he will start and play closer to 40 minutes nightly with the Warriors. His field-goal percentages are weak, but he turns in average to great numbers in all of the other guard categories.

DWYANE WADE, SG - MIA

Wade is a scintillating athlete, but is his talent transcendent? He probably is too small (6-4) and too inaccurate from long range to regularly play shooting guard, his college position, and he never played the point at Marquette. Still, Wade is as quick as they come, and he averaged 4.4 assists as a senior playing off the ball. He will get his opportunities early in Miami, which makes him a top rookie pick, but don't use anything more than a late pick on him. Too risky.

DAJUAN WAGNER, SG - CLE

Wagner is a pure scorer and a gunner at heart, but when you're just 6-3, that style can land you in the NBDL in a hurry. Wagner's talent is unquestionable, but like many Cavs players, he is young and can be undisciplined and erratic. The arrival of coach Paul Silas will help, but Wagner--who will have to compete for minutes with 6-8 LeBron James and 6-7 Ricky Davis--can become an elite player only if he develops point-guard skills.

CHARLIE WARD, PG - NYK

Ward is New York's starting point guard -- but only by default, and only for the moment. The Knicks would love to replace him, but Howard Easley has been a disappointment and the club isn't sure rookie Frank Williams is the answer. If Ward holds on to the job, his scoring, assists and 3s should get a nice boost. Not nearly enough, however, to warrant drafting him.

Wesley is as boring as rice pudding, but he has been undeniably productive and consistent over the years. His shooting percentages could be a little better, and he has been banged up the last couple of seasons, but he is decent or good in every guard category when healthy. Courtney Alexander might make a run at Wesley's starting spot, but Wesley has withstood similar challenges before.

RODNEY WHITE, G/F - DEN

White has worn out the patience of most NBA folks who were in his corner, so it's a good thing that last season he started to show what he is capable of. He has forward size and guard skills, but he hasn't been able to consistently take advantage of the combination. The potential is there, though, making him a decent sleeper. White likely will start at shooting guard this season, and his scoring, rebounding, assists and 3s should make him a decent reserve in most leagues.

CHRIS WHITNEY, G - WAS

Whitney provides a big boost in the 3-pointer and free-throw percentage categories, but he is either average or below everywhere else. Worse, he seems to be out of a starting job now that Larry Hughes is in D.C. If Whitney somehow winds up playing as many minutes as he did last season, he'll have value as a reserve, but that's doubtful -- his size is a liability on defense and he isn't much of a playmaker.

ALVIN WILLIAMS, PG - TOR

Williams raised his profile as a scorer last season, but his assists were stagnant--in large part because Toronto was shredded by injuries and Williams often was counted on more to make shots than to create them for others. J-Will still has plenty of holes in his game--streaky shooting, weak rebounding and few trips to the free throw line--but he jelled with teammates in the second half last season and finished second in the league in assists, with minimal turnovers. Williams isn't likely to enjoy a spike in points, but those assists are gold.

JAY WILLIAMS, PG - CHI

Williams is the popular Rookie of the Year candidate -- and for good reason. He is an explosive scorer, from outside or in the lane, and has become an outstanding table-setter, as well. His free-throw shooting needs work and he could pile up turnovers working out the kinks (especially with so many other youngsters in Chicago), but those things hardly will spoil his other assets.

SHAMMOND WILLIAMS, PG - ORL

Williams is a hit-or-miss player. He could turn out to be the starting point guard in Boston, in which case his value would be pretty solid in many leagues. VINCENT YARBROUGH, G/F - DEN

Yarbrough is an on-the-fringe player who could carve out a niche in Denver and turn in decent reserve value in fantasy leagues, or get left behind in the Nuggets' ever-evolving rebuilding plan. Yarbrough's game is a little of this and a little of that, but a lot of nothing. He simply doesn't stand out in any area. Denver's talent level has improved since last season, so a strong start will be imperative for Yarbrough to secure a role. He isn't draft-worthy in most leagues, but watch him to see if he merits a waiver-wire pickup in season.

SHAREEF ABDUR-RAHIM, PF - ATL

No matter where he plays, it seems, Abdur-Rahim will remain as anonymous as a graveyard-shift worker. That's welcome news for fantasy owners. Let the amateurs in your league fight over the Iversons and Webbers. You grab the guy who never has missed more than five games in a season and consistently puts up above-average numbers in five categories. Abdur-Rahim doesn't hit many 3s, his blocks are down and his turnovers can be a burden. But the pros far outweigh the cons.

DAVID ANDERSEN, F - ATL

Andersen, a seven-foot Australian whom the Hawks took with the 37th overall pick in the draft, is like most foreign big men: skilled, athletic, but stringy. Andersen, listed at 242 pounds on draft day, needs to beef up, and he probably will play in Europe again this season. You probably can write him off until next year.

SHANDON ANDERSON, SF - NYK

Anderson is what he is, but some fantasy owners can live with that. He is coming off one of his most successful shooting seasons, he has turned in average to good value in seven categories at times in his career and he hasn't missed a game in four years. Anderson would be even better if the Knicks had a legitimate inside game (it might be on the way), but grab him in one of the last two rounds of a standard draft and you can't go wrong.

Anthony is similar to last season's top rookie forward, Caron Butler, in that he is great at nothing and good at nearly everything. Anthony figures to provide solid scoring and rebounding numbers right away, and his assists, steals and 3s should be decent or better.

RON ARTEST, G/F - IND

Artest's borderline lunacy has put him on the hot seat. He will play, but it might not be in Indiana. No matter what uniform he is wearing, his antics will get him suspended and tossed from games too often. Injuries are an issue--mostly because he is so aggressive--but Artest is a steals hound and comes close to providing positive value in every category. He should remain a starter-caliber fantasy option.

Baker clearly has some personal issues to work out before he can become an impact player again--and that doesn't even count his struggles to keep his weight down. Still, if Shawn Kemp can return from the brink to be a serviceable NBA center, why can't Baker, arguably a more skilled player? If he can, Baker will provide scoring, rebounding, a solid field-goal percentage and, at his best, blocks.

TONY BATTIE, F/C - BOS

By now, it's clear: Battie, the No. 5 pick in the 1997 draft, is nothing special. That doesn't mean, however, that he is without value. In fact, he's a solid No. 2 fantasy center in many leagues. If offseason knee surgery isn't a lingering problem (it isn't expected to be), Battie will be good for field-goal shooting, blocks and rebounding, in that order. And for a big guy, his free throw shooting is a bonus.

SHANE BATTIER, G/F - MEM

Hoops purists and fantasy geeks alike love Battier, a hustler who racks up steals and blocks and who makes a difference in other categories despite limited ability. Trouble is, Battier isn't quite big enough, and the Grizzlies have a ton of options at the wing positions. If projected starters Mike Miller and James Posey and former starters Michael Dickerson and Wesley Person all are healthy, Battier could be left out in the cold.

Baxter had an excellent summer league season, and his chances of earning minutes have improved since Marcus Fizer blew out his knee last season. Still, Baxter is on the smallish side and he could just as easily wind up shut out of the rotation as be included in it. If he gets significant playing time, he'll have the most to offer in the scoring, rebounding, blocks and field-goal percentage categories.

Thought to be too small, too soft and too inconsistent to succeed in the NBA, he played himself into a starting role as a rookie—albeit with the hard-up Cavs. But a job is a job, and Boozer performs his well enough, delivering in the big-man categories and throwing in a nice free throw clip.

Bosh is lanky and raw (he left Georgia Tech after his freshman year), but he could develop into an athletic double-double force one day soon. Initially, he will have to overcome a playing time crunch at the Raptors' best-stocked position. But if he earns decent floor time as a rookie, he should offer owners blocked shots, rebounds, a strong field-goal clip and perhaps points.

Bradley isn't the most athletic player in the league, but he should look to Golden State's Troy Murphy as a role model who has proven a big guy with a jump shot and a nose for rebounding can succeed at the highest level. When he gets the minutes, Bradley is an asset in scoring, rebounding, blocks and field-goal shooting. But he has lots of competition and doesn't seem to fit the style the Raptors are going for.

Brand is a freak. Listed at 6-8, he regularly ranks among the league leaders in rebounds, blocks and field-goal percentage, and he gets the vast majority of his points in the paint. That said, he would benefit greatly from playing alongside another good big man. Brand has had to play some center in the past, so he might qualify there. He had been pretty durable before missing 20 games because of injury last season.

KEDRICK BROWN, F - BOS

The Celtics still have high hopes for Brown, who was selected with the No. 11 pick out of junior college in 2001 but didn't contribute much as a rookie last season. He has big-time leaping ability, which will translate into rebounds and tip-ins (i.e., scoring), and 3-point range. He still needs to polish up that jumper, though, and will need more floor time to be worth having around in most leagues. He might be ready to join the rotation this season, so he's not a bad grab late in deep drafts.

KWAME BROWN, F/C - WAS

Brown, the No. 1 overall pick out of high school in 2001, has been labeled a bust, but he could be ready to bust out. Michael Jordan and Doug Collins rode him hard the last two seasons, and a more positive atmosphere could be just what he needs. At any rate, Brown will get what else he needs--playing time--to succeed. He figures to start, play at least 30 minutes a game and be the Wizards' first offensive option on the low block. That should give him at least top reserve value in standard leagues.

Brown isn't anything special as a fantasy player, but you can count on a near double-double for the season, plus blocks and fine field-goal and free-throw shooting. Not bad at all for a third forward in most leagues. Still, if you're looking for scoring or 3s at the forward spot, consider other options.

CARON BUTLER, SF - MIA

Butler quietly had an outstanding rookie season that is all the more remarkable in light of how little help he had. It's good to know Butler can shoulder the load because he'll be doing a lot of the heavy lifting again for a weak Miami squad. Similar players have made incremental statistical gains in their second seasons and have begun to improve their 3-point stroke. Expect the same from Butler.

MARCUS CAMBY, F/C - DEN

With Camby, it's pretty much all or nothing for fantasy owners. If he is healthy, he easily can be a top 100 player--especially in category leagues. But if his body gets cranky (and that can be often), he can miss lots of games and play like a ghost in those he doesn't. At his best, he is a good to excellent scorer, rebounder and shot blocker who can put up a nice shooting percentage from the field. Just don't count on him for much.

ELDEN CAMPBELL, F/C - DET

Campbell has been in a fantasy (and career) freefall since the second half of the 2001-02 season. His play long has depended on his fluctuating motivation level, and at 35, his skills might be in decline. The Pistons are high on Mehmet Okur, and Ben Wallace will play some center as well. At his best, Campbell scores, rebounds and blocks shots, but it probably would take an injury or two to turn him into a viable fantasy option again.

VINCE CARTER, G/F - TOR

Carter's Q-rating is way down these days, which means you might be able to grab him with a bargain pick. He has missed 61 games in the last two years because of injuries, so he doesn't come without risk. But the reward could be immense. Carter's career averages all bear positive values in a standard roto league and would give him close to first-round worth in an 80-game season.

TYSON CHANDLER, F/C - CHI

Chandler is a long way from fulfilling his fantasy potential, but a small breakthrough is possible this season. Though his strength and free throw shooting need more work, he averaged a near double-double and 1.9 blocks after the All-Star break last season. He is more valuable if he qualifies at center in your league, but if he continues to develop, he will be a solid reserve even as a forward.

OUSMANE CISSE, PF - ORL

SAM CLANCY, F - PHI

KEON CLARK, F/C - UTH

Clark regressed last season, at least in part because he received fewer minutes. He looks like a niche player, and could be overmatched as a starter on a bad Utah squad. Offensively, he has been at his best as a trailer on the break and as a sneaky putback rebounder. He isn't likely to suddenly begin creating his own offense with the Jazz. Clark has value, though, because his rebounding and blocks numbers--already decent--should improve with 6-10 more minutes per game.

DERRICK COLEMAN, F/C - PHI

Despite playing hurt much of last season, Coleman was pretty productive and -- if you can believe it -- reliable. But the left knee that bugged him has been slow to heal after surgery, and Coleman is now expected to be out until at least November. That, combined with his age (35), weight and attitude, should make you wary of him.

NICK COLLISON, PF - SEA

Opinions vary on how Collison will fare as a pro, but his array of post moves and mid-range jumper will ensure he has a job in the NBA for a while. As a 6-9, limited athlete, however, can he be a productive starting power forward for Seattle? Don't waste a pick in standard leagues to find out this season, but keep a close eye on him as a potential in-season pickup. He could provide points, rebounds and nice shooting percentages.

CHRIS CRAWFORD, SF - ATL

Crawford always seems on the verge of establishing himself as a solid contributor, but something -- usually an injury -- always trips him up. He can be a decent scorer-rebounder who puts up reasonable shooting percentages (though he shoots very few 3s), but he needs to stay healthy and work his way back into the regular rotation first. Pass on him for now.

AUSTIN CROSHERE, PF - IND

That he has done so little in the last two seasons seemingly makes Croshere an iffy fantasy draft pick. But he has been a favorite of Rick Carlisle, the Pacers' former assistant and current head coach, and speculation is high that Croshere will go back to playing a prominent role in the team's rotation--and perhaps in the starting lineup. When given sufficient minutes, he is a good scorer-rebounder who carries excellent all-around shooting percentages. That makes him a sleeper.

EDDY CURRY, F/C - CHI

Curry was dominant over the final two months of last season, though he still needs to work on his conditioning. His low assists and steals totals don't hurt much from a center, but his rebounds and free throw shooting do. Still, he should become a starter-worthy fantasy center this season, and perhaps a star, especially in points leagues.

ANTONIO DAVIS, F/C - TOR

Davis is a proven double-double guy who also is good for blocks and a nice free throw clip for a power player. But injuries ruined last season for him, and playing center (he is a natural power forward) is aging him fast and dragging down his field-goal shooting. That said, if he doesn't qualify at the position in your fantasy league, he loses most of his fading luster.

BEN DAVIS, PF - HOU

DALE DAVIS, F/C - POR

Davis never was a great scorer, and his rebounding and shot blocking aren't what they used to be either. But he still does all three well enough--and will have ample opportunity to produce--that he deserves a spot on someone's roster in the majority of leagues. That might change if Davis fails to qualify at center or something (most likely a trade) unsettles his situation.

Davis became a starter-caliber fantasy guard when he began stroking the 3 and setting up teammates last season. But could the arrival of LeBron James and coach Paul Silas knock him back down a notch or three? Not likely. The Cavs need scoring and playmaking in the worst way, and Davis can be counted on for both. Just beware of those shooting percentages.

CARLOS DELFINO, G/F - DET

BORIS DIAW-RIFFIOD, G/F - ATL

Diaw isn't a ready-made NBA scorer, but he is a good fit for the Hawks and will contribute immediately in other areas. Because Jason Terry essentially is an undersized shooting guard, Diaw, an exceptional passer at 6-9, can help as a distributor and defending opposing 2s. Diaw is young and has questionable aggressiveness, but the Hawks' dearth of alternatives in the backcourt means he should get minutes right away. A deep sleeper.

KANIEL DICKENS, PF - POR

Critics of Duncan's robotic playing style and flair for the bland never owned him in a fantasy league. He is prolific, consistent, durable and--if you can believe it--still improving. Just check out his rebounds, assists, blocks and field-goal shooting numbers. Don't be surprised if he quickly addresses last season's dip in free throw percentage, though those turnovers likely aren't going away.

Dunleavy showed signs of life at the end of his rookie season, and the Warriors sent a clear message when they traded Antawn Jamison to Dallas: Dunleavy will play. But how will he play? He still is physically underdeveloped, but Dunleavy did get stronger in the offseason and his outside game and guard skills will lead to good 3-point and assist numbers--valuable stuff from a forward. His field-goal shooting probably will remain below average until he gets stronger.

MICHAEL FINLEY, G/F - DAL

Once a rock of reliability, Finley has missed 13 games in each of the last two seasons. He still is in his prime, and his stats are sterling when he is healthy. The Mavs have a loaded roster, but Finley has no direct competition for minutes, and his status as team leader probably will ensure he won't lose many touches. If he stays healthy, his preseason ranking will prove low.

DANNY FORTSON, PF - DAL

Fortson is a nice guy to have around in points leagues, but his field-goal shooting and lack of blocks at a power position leveled his owners in category leagues last year. He was a career 48.5-percent shooter from the field going into the season, so he could bounce back. Trouble is, he no longer is a starter in Golden State and might be traded. He should be drafted late, but only as a reserve.

JEFF FOSTER, F/C - IND

Foster would have decent value if he got significant minutes -- he's a rock-solid rebounder, and his other numbers aren't bad -- but he's behind Brad Miller on the depth chart and might have to scrounge for the leftover minutes with the Pacers' other Foster (Greg).

RICK FOX, SF - LAL

Fox is particularly appealing in category leagues because He is a producer in every area but blocks. Two more reasons to like him: He hasn't missed a game in more than three seasons, and He is a prime candidate to fill the scoring void if Shaquille O'Neal misses much time because of injuries.

PLAYER ANALYSIS/STATISTICS - FORWARDS

KEVIN GARNETT, SF - MIN

Garnett, a potential fantasy MVP, is awesome in basic leagues and downgrades only slightly--to simply studly--when 3-pointers, free throw shooting and turnovers are factored in. If Dirk Nowitzki and Tim Duncan aren't centers in your league, an argument can be made for grabbing KG with the first pick, regardless of scoring format. The Timberwolves' makeover could affect his numbers somewhat, but the new additions probably will be more of a blessing than a threat.

PAT GARRITY, PF - ORL

Garrity is an excellent shooter, particularly from the 3-point and free-throw lines, but he falls well short of what most fantasy owners expect from their power forward in the rebounds and blocks categories. That makes Garrity best suited to points leagues or utility spots in roto formats, but his value is undeniable. His upside is minimal, though, and Orlando's recent acquisitions (namely Drew Gooden and Gordan Giricek) might eat into his playing time.

PAU GASOL, PF - MEM

Gasol is your basic top-notch scorer-rebounder-shot blocker, but he comes with a few warnings. First, he gives his owners next to nothing in 3s and steals. And though he hasn't missed a game in his two-year career, he gets banged up often. Last season, his teammates and coaches thought he could have played harder at times. Bottom line: He isn't perfect, but he deserves a top 40 ranking--and, at 23, could move higher.

DEVEAN GEORGE, SF - LAL

An injury that could keep Rick Fox out until the spring means George is the lucky duck who gets to play in a starting lineup with four future Hall of Famers. Great, but it also will keep him from putting up big scoring numbers. George still can be a viable roto-league sub in the meantime--he had solid all-around numbers last season in limited minutes--but he probably won't be worth a roster spot in points leagues.

GIOANNIS GIANNOULIS, F - TOR

GORDAN GIRICEK, G/F - ORL

Giricek is a dead-eye shooter and a potential No. 2 scorer behind Tracy McGrady in Orlando, yet he's no Euro softy. He is a much better rebounder than he might appear to be, and his assists and steals climbed after his midseason trade from Memphis. He has seven-category potential.

DION GLOVER, G/F - ATL

Glover has lots of issues: He's a 'tweener, he's injury-prone, he's stuck in a playing-time competition with Emanuel Davis, Ira Newble and, indirectly, rookie point guard Dan Dickau. That said, Glover was great during summer league play and can be productive if he stays healthy and gets a chance. That's a lot of ifs, though. You probably can wait to pick him up as a free agent in most standard leagues.

PLAYER ANALYSIS/STATISTICS - FORWARDS

DREW GOODEN, F - ORL

Gooden still is erratic and makes poor decisions at times, but he clearly is a gifted scorer and rebounder. He is sure to average significantly more than the 26.8 minutes per game he got as a rookie, and he could very well provide positive value in every category but 3s and assists. Because he'll turn in a bunch of 20-and-10s, his value in points leagues is much higher. And check your league's rules on position qualifying--Gooden could play some center this season, which would instantly vault him into the top 100.

BRIAN GRANT, F/C - MIA

Grant is an excellent rebounder and one tough dude, but he simply isn't big enough to take the nightly pounding as an NBA center. The good news is that he should qualify at the position in fantasy leagues--his value drops precipitously if he can be used only at forward. Grant has the potential to offer positive value in five categories, but the Heat will have to get him some help in the frontcourt first.

HORACE GRANT, F/C - LAL

Grant nearly retired in the offseason, so he clearly is near the end. If he manages to keep the wheels from coming off in his 16th season, he could be a decent backup in deep leagues -- especially if in your league he qualifies at center, where he actually plays for Orlando.

EDDIE GRIFFIN, PF - HOU

Griffin is quite a talent, but is he willing to do what it takes to get better? He showed only minor improvements in some areas last season, and his free throw shooting actually nose-dived. Plus, his character issues have lingered, and his new coach traditionally has favored scrappy effort guys like Adrian Griffin, who will compete with his teammate and namesake for playing time. Take Griffin as a reserve--his 3s and blocks are a unique combination of premium stats--but don't set your expectations too high.

TOM GUGLIOTTA, PF - PHO

Thanks to injuries, Googs may never be the same player he was in the early years of his career. He hasn't played in more than 57 games since the '96-97 season, and last year his numbers wouldn't have been worth keeping him around in even moderately deep leagues. Don't bother grabbing him in standard league drafts, but watch him to see if he gets some of that old friskiness back and is worth an in-season pickup.

RICHARD HAMILTON, G/F - DET

Hamilton wins the booby prize for worst fantasy player among the league's top scorers. He is a gifted midrange shooter, but there isn't much else to his game, making him little more than a two-category player. Unless he puts a charge into his 3-point shooting, Hamilton has little fantasy upside.

MATT HARPRING, SF - UTH

Harpring set several offensive career highs last season, his first in Utah. He is risky because Andrei Kirilenko, perhaps Utah's most promising player, also is a small forward and because Harpring was a bit player until he started running with John Stockton and Karl Malone, who now are gone. Make him your fourth forward, and you'll be in good shape.

AL HARRINGTON, F - IND

Harrington could be an ex-Pacer any day now, which probably would be the best thing for him. Indiana has a logjam of forwards, and Harrington probably will see his minutes head south if new Pacers head man Rick Carlisle remains his coach. Further complicating Harrington's fantasy future is his development--which seemed to hit a snag last season--and his low productivity in key categories (3s, steals and blocks). He is a sleeper, but he has the most upside in points leagues.

OTHELLA HARRINGTON, PF - NYK

Harrington wasn't supposed to be much of a factor in fantasy play this season, but a potentially season-ending injury to Antonio McDyess leaves a gaping hole at power forward in New York. The Knicks have a few options, but the only one that seems to make much sense is starting Harrington -- who is capable of good shooting percentages and rebounding numbers and modest scoring.

JARVIS HAYES, G/F - WAS

Hayes doesn't stand out in any one area, but he seems to have all the requisite skills of an NBA swingman. He is a good but not great shooter, and he is more athletic than your average spot-up guy. His size (6-7, 220) will come in handy at the 2, though the presence of Jerry Stackhouse means he probably will get most of his minutes at small forward. Hayes probably isn't rookie of the year material, but a combination of talent and opportunity could make him viable, especially in deeper leagues.

JAMES HEAD, F - IND

ALAN HENDERSON, F/C - ATL

Injuries have plagued Henderson since the 1999-2000 season, when he played 82 games and put up career numbers. He's stuck behind Shareef Abdur-Rahim, and he isn't exactly a fantasy prize when he does get a lot of floor time -- his scoring and rebounding can be assets, but the rest of his stats are average or worse.

CORY HIGHTOWER, SF - LAL

NENE HILARIO, F/C - DEN

Hilario was better in points leagues last season because his shooting percentages and turnovers hurt him quite a bit in most roto formats. He should make the usual strides of a second-year player, and his percentages in particular could make a nice upswing if Marcus Camby can stay healthy and give the Nuggets another post presence for defenses to deal with. It's worth knowing Hilario was among the league leaders in steals--an oddity for a big man, and a bonus for his owners.

GRANT HILL, SF - ORL

Are you a risk-taker? If so, Hill is your guy. He'll be a top-20 fantasy performer if the bum ankle that has limited him to 18 games in the last two years is completely healed -- he says it is -- and he avoids further injury. The odds on both of those are pretty long, though. In standard leagues, he probably should be no higher than your third forward.

TYRONE HILL, PF - PHI

Hill remains one of the league's toughest rebounders, and he could revisit the double-double days of his first stint in Cleveland. Of course, he is no spring chicken, and the Cavs' youth movement might adversely affect his numbers. But the bet here is, if he can stay healthy, Hill will get a ton of rebounds off all those Cavalier bricks and score enough off putbacks to be worth a top reserve spot in many leagues.

ROBERT HORRY, PF - SA

Horry's famous three-point touch eluded him last season, but he should bounce back with San Antonio. He is at his best playing off a dominant inside presence, but the Spurs have better offensive balance than the Lakers, which should help Horry maintain a rhythm. He will back up Tim Duncan but also play alongside him quite a bit. Horry won't score much, but the rest of his stats should be average or better.

FRED HOUSE, G/F - ATL

JOSH HOWARD, G/F - DAL

Howard was a low first-rounder and has been blown off by many fantasy owners already because Dallas is loaded with plenty of skilled, more experienced players. But Howard is a good defender and athletic enough to create his own offense and be a factor on the boards. He could do for the Mavs what Adrian Griffin did a year ago, only do it more productively. A deep sleeper.

JUWAN HOWARD, PF - ORL

Howard, a nine-year vet, doesn't have much upside. He is a nonfactor in the premium categories and isn't particularly great in the others. But grouped with a bunch of young runners and outside gunners in Orlando, he should increase his rebounds and shooting percentages this season. He annually is a solid starting fantasy forward.

Humphrey will rebound and block some shots -- He is athletic enough to do that in any league -- but he figures to have some trouble deploying an already limited offensive game as a 6-8 power forward. He should earn some minutes, but he probably will have value only as a reserve in deep leagues.

Jackson will be playing for some NBA team and will be moderately productive -- certainly enough so to be worth playing at a utility spot in many leagues. STEPHEN JACKSON, G/F - ATL

Jackson emerged as a force on the floor and in fantasy play last season, but how much of it should be credited to the Spurs? Will he remain as effective, or even produce more, in a new environment? Those questions kept him out of the TSN top 100, but Jackson's three-point shooting and steals potential are worth a roster spot--probably that of a top reserve--in every league. With enough minutes and better shot selection, he should at least hold his own in every category but blocks.

He might be King James, but LeBron still has dues to pay in the NBA. His 3-point shot is a work in progress, and he could have turnover issues. Yet James also could put up an interesting combination of numbers (points, assists and steals) and probably will qualify at guard and forward.

ANTAWN JAMISON, F - DAL

Jamison will sacrifice some scoring in his move from Golden State to Dallas, but not much else. The Mavericks' style will keep his rebounding numbers up, and could actually help improve his shooting efficiency, assists and turnovers. Not much of an outside shooter, Jamison nevertheless holds his own on 3s, and he has made Mailman-esque improvements at the free throw line. Reliability? He hasn't missed a game in three years.

MARKO JARIC, G/F - LAC

Jaric had an up-and-down rookie season, but he showed enough to prove he's deserving of a shot at a starting job. In 12 starts last year, he averaged 12.4 points, 3.5 rebounds and 4.0 assists. With Andre Miller gone, Jaric will be asked to be more of a playmaker than scorer in his new role, so his assists should rise, and at 6-7, he will be one of the league's best rebounding point guards. If Jaric's shot keeps coming around, the sky's the limit. He's a top sleeper.

RICHARD JEFFERSON, SF - NJN

Jefferson made nice strides in his first season as a starter, but he won't become an impact fantasy player outside of points leagues until he develops an outside game. Some of his numbers slipped in the second half last season, so perhaps fatigue was a factor as Jefferson averaged almost 12 minutes more per game than he did as a rookie. With a 3-point stroke, he becomes the total package. Even without it, he is a borderline starter.

JARED JEFFRIES, SF - WAS

Even with an added 20 pounds of muscle, which he reportedly has packed on since the end of the college season, Jeffries still is frail. The Wizards already have one skin-and-bones player (say hello, Richard Hamilton), but Jeffries is as skilled as any first-year player, and the Wizards would rather have a skinny talent than a beefy stiff in the lineup. If he is tougher than he looks, Jeffries will put up solid all-around numbers (save for his free-throw percentage) and might have a Rookie of the Year-type season.

Johnson went on a binge over the final week of last season, then disappeared in the playoffs--a stretch fairly representative of his young NBA career. There is little doubt Johnson can be an above-average fantasy producer in every category but blocks, but can he do it regularly? And how soon? Remember, he still is a pup (just 22) and would have been a rookie this season if he had stayed four years at Arkansas. His value is highest in category leagues, but he should be ready to fill a top reserve role and perhaps start in all standard-depth fantasy leagues.

FRED JONES, G/F - IND

Jones, the Pacers' first-round pick (No. 14 overall), is an insane leaper and a pretty fair shooter, but he had only one truly outstanding college season and doesn't have anywhere to play. Minutes at shooting guard behind Reggie Miller will be scarce, and though the Pacers say Jones can play the point, the team already has another promising young player there: Jamaal Tinsley. Only gamble on Jones with one of your last picks in a very deep league.

JUMAINE JONES, SF - BOS

Playing time will be the key for Jones, who can run, hit 3s and even mix it up inside a bit--precisely the sort of skills the Celtics love in a player. If Jones can overcome Eric Williams at small forward, he could be a solid utility fantasy starter in most leagues. Best-case scenario: Jones turns in positive value in points, 3s, rebounds and steals--and comes close in the other categories.

POPEYE JONES, PF - GS

Jones might start at power forward for Dallas, and he'll certainly get significant floor time. He isn't great, but he scores a little, puts up fine rebounding numbers and is a very good free-throw shooter for a big man. Unfortunately, he doesn't block many shots and is a poor shooter from the floor -- especially for a power guy. FANTASY SPIN: A potentially decent reserve in deep leagues.

ANDREI KIRILENKO, SF - UTH

Considering what Kirilenko has done (dominating in premium categories--blocks, steals and shooting percentages) and the amount of time he has done it in (27.7 minutes per game last year), he is worth sticking your neck out for with an early pick. With the Jazz headed toward a clear-cut youth movement and Kirilenko building up his body and confidence, he is poised to take on a greatly expanded role.

TONI KUKOC, F - MIL

Kukoc appeared washed up a few years ago, but his post-All-Star-break performance last season (12.7 ppg, 4.3 rpg, 3.5 apg) indicates he can be a big part of the Bucks' immediate future. Because the team will need all the help it can get, he could turn in positive value in seven categories. But Kukoc, now 35 and rarely a picture of health in his younger days, will have a tough time avoiding injury. Draft him as a reserve and you won't get burned.

CHRISTIAN LAETTNER, PF - WAS

Yeah, we can hardly believe it ourselves. But Laettner deserves a spot in the top 100. He ranked among the top 65 in the second half last season, when most of his numbers spiked--including great free throw shooting and assist numbers for a power forward. He'll be in trouble if Kwame Brown and/or Jared Jeffries take off this season, but the Wizards need a geezer or two to show their kids the ropes.

RAEF LAFRENTZ, F/C - DAL

LaFrentz does things other good big men do (score, rebound, block shots), but he also knocks down 3s, which makes him particularly valuable in category leagues. Still, LaFrentz has to be on the floor to display those skills, and he saw his minutes dwindle last season as the Mavs slowly began to realize he was a poor fit. He might still be traded, which would be the best thing for his fantasy value.

RASHARD LEWIS, SF - SEA

Well-rounded numbers and still-untapped potential make him an intriguing pick. Lewis could beef up his stats by being more assertive, but that probably will come with age. Still, don't get sucked into taking him too high -- just because NBA teams overpay for potential doesn't mean you have to.

GEORGE LYNCH, G/F - NO

Magloire isn't special, but he is strong in two categories (rebounding and field-goal percentage) and gets the job done in two others (points and blocks). He never will be a force because his offensive game is limited, but he could put up the sort of numbers fantasy owners received from Dale Davis in Davis' prime.

COREY MAGGETTE, G/F - LAC

Maggette needs to stay healthy (50 missed games in the last three years), but he has the talent--and now the opportunity--to become a very good starting fantasy guard. He went from possibly being the Clippers' fifth-best scoring option to No. 2, behind Elton Brand. If he avoids injury and keeps honing his outside shot, Maggette could become a top 50 fantasy player in roto and points formats alike.

The Mailman isn't the same player he was just two years ago, but the Lakers will be tickled to get just two-thirds of the player they saw last season. Malone won't suddenly turn into Samaki Walker in L.A., but his scoring will plummet. The rest of his numbers--good to great in all categories but 3s and blocks--should remain pretty level.

SHAWN MARION, SF - PHO

A steady, studly secret. Marion ranked among the top players in the league in six of the 10 most significant roto categories last season, including two premium spots (blocks and steals). He hasn't received his due because the Suns have been out of the limelight for most of his career and because Stephon Marbury and Amare Stoudemire--and Jason Kidd before them--have grabbed most of the attention. Fine by us. Maybe Marion can be swiped with a second-round pick.

DONYELL MARSHALL, F - CHI

Marshall has talent, but he always seems to wind up on the fringe of his team's plans. When he is on his game and earning minutes, he turns in positive value in every category but assists (and he doesn't hurt you there). But Marshall has too much competition for playing time at both forward spots in Chicago, and likely won't be worth owning unless he is traded.

Martin doesn't rebound enough for a power forward or hit enough 3-pointers for a small forward, and he doesn't score enough, period. He still is finding his niche with the Nets, though it's possible this could be a breakout season for him now that his role is clearly defined. Just be careful: He could be one of this season's most overrated fantasy players.

JAMAL MASHBURN, SF - NO

Mashburn is coming off arguably his best pro season, in which he posted several career highs and didn't miss a game for the first time in his career. That's a little much to ask for two years in a row, but Mashburn is in his prime and has a stable situation in New Orleans. One of the best sources for assists at forward, he should put up similar numbers if he avoids returning to his injury-prone ways.

ANTHONY MASON, PF - MIL

Mason is aging fast and coming off his least productive season in almost a decade, but the Bucks need him now more than ever. They have a rookie point guard who has no safety net, so Mason's ball-handling and playmaking aren't just luxuries anymore. They easily could have the league's least rebounding and low-post talent, so his muscle is imperative. But how much does Mase have left? And will he implode on an awful team? He missed 17 games last season and barely was worth owning when he played, so don't go out of your way to draft him.

DESMOND MASON, G/F - MIL

Mason is stuck in a bad spot. Milwaukee is a bad club that can't afford to waste its best talent, but neither can it afford to start a career 27.8-percent 3-point shooter next to a rookie point guard (T.J. Ford) who could be much worse from that range--especially when the Bucks can go to Michael Redd (43.8 on 3s last year) instead. Mason will play and put up good, and in some cases very good, numbers in most categories. But if you're looking for a breakthrough season, it won't happen unless the Bucks make a trade.

WALTER MCCARTY, F - BOS

McCarty is a fairly one-dimensional player -- and the dimension doesn't even make much sense for a 6-10 guy. He's a 3-point shooter, but he doesn't block many shots or come up with many steals for a player of his length and ranginess. If McCartney played more minutes, his scoring and rebounding would potentially be useful, but he is a 10th-man type. Probably no help unless injuries hit.

GEORGE MCCLOUD, G/F - GS

McCloud is getting up there in years, and considering he isn't exactly a picture of physical fitness, he might find his decline faster than others on the down side. He'll play at first for sure, but there are too many young players in Denver with at least a little promise for McCloud to be simply taking up space for long. He'll have a little value early on and if someone gets hurt, but in most leagues you'd be better off drafting a kid with potential.

ANTONIO MCDYESS, PF - NYK

McDyess, who played just 10 games last year because of a knee injury, fractured his kneecap Oct. 12 and is out for the season. It's a tough deal -- he looked like a stud in the preseason -- but write him off until you know he's healthy.

AARON MCKIE, G/F - PHI

McKie began last season on a tear, but his effectiveness gradually waned. With noted defense superfreak Larry Brown having left town, how will McKie's role change? Does the acquisition of Glenn Robinson kill his value? Our take: McKie will earn minutes because he can play three positions and is a defensive stopper, but his role will be diminished. That marginalized his value from solid utility guy or bench bandito to back-of-the-roster fantasy player.

STANISLAV MEDVEDENKO, PF - LAL

An injury that could keep Rick Fox out until the spring means George is the lucky duck who gets to play in a starting lineup with four future Hall of Famers. Great, but it also will keep him from putting up big scoring numbers. George still can be a viable roto-league sub in the meantime--he had solid all-around numbers last season in limited minutes--but he probably won't be worth a roster spot in points leagues.

RON MERCER, G/F - SA

Mercer is a better-than-average scorer who isn't much of a defender or outside shooter. He has also been snakebit by injuries and bad situations in Boston, Denver and Chicago. He could be a nice scorer off the bench if things break right for him in Indiana this season, but he is injury-prone and most of his numbers are nothing special -- or are just plain bad. And there usually is a reason a player of his talent gets shuttled from team to team. Don't count on him.

DARIUS MILES, G/F - CLE

Miles hasn't panned out the way the Cavs had hoped when they traded away Andre Miller to the Clippers before the start of last season. Still, it's easy to forget that Miles is only 22. He must add bulk and sharpen his shot if he ever is to make good on his status as a former No. 3 pick, but his length and athleticism will ensure that he produces as a rebounder and shot blocker. On a Cleveland roster that is much improved over last season's, Miles must stay healthy and show improvement or risk losing minutes.

DARKO MILICIC, F - DET

Milicic, a lefthanded 7-footer who has a typical European inside-out game but who has a toughness that defies the foreign stereotype, probably will be a special player someday. But he is just 18, a bit skinny and still developing. The Pistons have plenty of frontcourt players to hold down the fort, so Milicic likely won't be rushed. He's a good late pick in deep leagues and a great keeper pick, but his value will be limited this season.

MIKE MILLER, G/F - MEM

As frustrating as he can be to fantasy owners, Miller is wonderfully productive when healthy and in a favorable situation. He might have found one in Memphis, where he shot 50 percent or better from the floor and on 3s after his midseason trade from Orlando last year. If the Grizzlies can get his contract extension done before the season, it could further ease Miller's mind.

NAZR MOHAMMED, F/C - ATL

There is no telling whether Theo Ratliff will stay healthy, but much of Mohammed's fantasy value depends on it. If Ratliff misses a lot of time -- as he has the last four seasons -- Mohammed will be forced to play a ton of minutes, which isn't the worst thing that could happen. Mohammed is a good scorer and rebounder who shoots pretty well from the field. But he blocks very few shots for a center, and his playing time could be in question all year.

Murphy improved by leaps and bounds last season, mostly because he got stronger and cranked up his rebounding and inside game. He still is more of a jump shooter than a low-post scorer, but he might be asked to provide more scoring with Gilbert Arenas and Antawn Jamison gone. Because he falls short in the premium categories--3s, assists and blocks--Murphy's value is greater in points leagues, but he still is starter-caliber in roto formats.

Murray, who missed all last season because of a ligament tear in his right foot, is one of the league's best long-range shooters and an above-average all-around scorer when healthy. But his career has been marked by inconsistency, and teammate Morris Peterson is a similar and younger player. Murray might not get enough minutes to make a difference.

LEE NAILON, SF - ATL

While filling in for Jamal Mashburn as the starting small forward for much of last season, Nailon showed he has nice skills as a post-up player, mid-range shooter and defender. That's all well and good, but the bottom line is Nailon will have trouble finding minutes with the Hornets -- especially now that George Lynch is healthy and Kirk Haston is expected to be more of a factor. Keep an eye on him, though. He could be worth grabbing in many leagues if something changes.

EDUARDO NAJERA, SF - DAL

Najera is instant energy, and he'll have to remain so to carve out his niche in the NBA as a 6-8 post player. His situation in Dallas is a bit of a catch-22. He gets lots of rebounds, garbage buckets and points in transition playing with the Mavericks, but he also gets a lot fewer minutes than he might on a team that needed more help. The acquisition of Antawn Jamison hurts Najera's value, which might be negligible until he leaves Dallas.

IRA NEWBLE, G/F - CLE

Newble is mostly a defensive stopper, but he had a few short stretches in which he was quite productive for the Hawks last season. He could make a run at the starting shooting guard job, but, barring injuries, he probably won't play a ton of minutes. If he does, he'll provide the most help in the rebounding and shooting categories.

DIRK NOWITZKI, F/C - DAL

Clear-cut top picks are rare, but Nowitzki comes close. He scores, rebounds and blocks shots, but he sets himself apart with his 3s and assists—premium categories for a big man. The deeper the scoring format, the more valuable Nowitzki becomes. (His turnover totals are surprisingly low.) You're loopy if you consider anyone else at No. 1—unless Nowitzki doesn't qualify at center in your league.

JERMAINE O'NEAL, F/C - IND

O'Neal is a prototypical All-Star power forward: a 20-10 guy who ranks among the league leaders in field-goal accuracy and blocks. What makes O'Neal even more special is that he qualifies at center in most leagues, and his other numbers--those rarely associated with big men--are on the upswing. He'll never be a Nowitzki-esque outside shooter, but this season could be the first in which he turns in positive fantasy value in assists, steals and free throws.

Oak is as long in the teeth as they come in the NBA -- and is showing it. But he reportedly dropped some weight and is lighter than he has been since college. He still can rebound some, drop dimes and hit the occasional outside J. He's mostly in D.C. to watch Michael Jordan's back, though, so don't make him a big part of your plans.

LAMAR ODOM, SF - MIA

Odom has become something of a running joke, but when his mind and body are right, he can be a darn good player. It remains to be seen how he will get along with Pat Riley, and whether Odom can handle the power forward spot in the NBA. Odom's potential is through the roof--he will be expected, and seems able, to provide scoring, rebounding and assists--but is his head right? It's that question that makes him a risk. If Odom answers it in the affirmative, he could be fantasy hoops' best bargain of the year.

Okur ranked among the top 30 fantasy centers over the second half of last season despite coming off the bench until the last two weeks. BO OUTLAW, F/C - MEM

Outlaw probably will have little value unless someone gets hurt, but because Tom Gugliotta is an injury waiting to happen, he must be considered in deep leagues. Outlaw never has been a double-digit scorer, but his field-goal percentage always ranks among the league leaders, and his rebounding, steals and blocks are a factor.

RUBEN PATTERSON, G/F - POR

Patterson could be a decent fantasy asset if he played more and had any outside game to speak of, but don't look for either of those in the near future. The Blazers might have rid themselves of Shawn Kemp, but they went out and got Jeff McInnis and Antonio Daniels, and brought back Arvydas Sabonis. Even if those guys don't directly affect Patterson's minutes, the end result will be less floor time and fewer touches.

MORRIS PETERSON, G/F - TOR

Peterson hasn't developed as the Raptors had hoped, and he has been the subject of trade rumors off and on in the last year. The uncertainty of that situation alone makes him a bit dicey for fantasy owners. But if he can settle into a more complementary role on a healthier club, his numbers--particularly his weak field-goal percentage--should improve. He's a solid pick at the tail end of drafts because he has starter value in deeper leagues when he isn't asked to do too much.

ERIC PIATKOWSKI, G/F - HOU

Piatkowski is often overlooked -- even on his own team -- but he will have fantasy value if injuries hit the Clippers' backcourt. His 3-pointers are his best asset, though he is also one of the game's best all-around shooters. He isn't worth drafting in most leagues, but you'll know where to turn if Quentin Richardson or Corey Maggette are injured.

SCOTTIE PIPPEN, G/F - CHI

Does Pippen have anything left in the tank? Can he stay healthy? Was he brought back to Chicago to contribute or for a feel-good farewell tour? That the questions must be asked indicate Pippen isn't the sure thing he was for fantasy owners a few years ago, but it's worth mentioning that last season he turned in positive value in every category but blocks. He still can be one of the NBA's better all-around threats, and could be starter-caliber in some leagues if he stays healthy.

SCOT POLLARD, F/C - IND

Even with increased playing time in Indiana, Pollard isn't likely to see his scoring rise much. His rebounding, shot blocking and field-goal percentage, however, could be big assets. Just be sure he qualifies at center in your league. If he does, he is a potential top 100 fantasy player.

JAMES POSEY, G/F - MEM

Posey is a defensive specialist with enough offensive game to stick his nose into a fantasy starting lineup here and there. Though he moved from a playoff contender to a lottery team in the offseason, one could argue that the Grizzlies collectively have as much offensive talent as the Rockets did a year ago. Posey probably won't get many more scoring opportunities, but he should earn more minutes and possibly get back to the top 100 territory he occupied during his best days in Denver.

TAYSHAUN PRINCE, SF - DET

Prince was a surprise star of the postseason, and he is almost certain to take on an expanded role in his second season. He is skinny and might never bulk up enough to keep defenders from pushing him around in the post, but his perimeter game and 6-9 size will put him in more mismatches that are favorable than unfavorable. Points, 3s and blocks are his best assets, and if he carries his playoff performance into next season, he could be a top 100 player.

VLADIMIR RADMANOVIC, PF - SEA

Injuries held Radmanovic back last season, but he is an intriguing all-around talent and a big-time sleeper for 2003-04. At 6-10, he is an excellent shooter--even from three-point range--and he has the ball skills to turn in above-average assist and steals numbers. His field-goal percentage and rebounding would be more impressive if he had an inside game, but his perimeter game is what makes him a valuable fantasy commodity.

ZACHARY RANDOLPH, PF - POR

There is little doubt that Randolph, one way or another, will get an expanded role this season. He has awesome potential as a low-post scorer and rebounder, as he showed in the 2003 playoffs (13.9 ppg, 8.7 rpg), but his poor production in the premium categories--not just 3s and steals, but also blocks--limits his value in roto leagues.

THEO RATLIFF, F/C - ATL

It will be a long time before Ratliff can shake his rep as an injury risk, but playing 81 games last season was a start. He led the league in blocks and took care of business on the boards. The next step is getting his scoring and shooting back to their levels of a few years ago. His value isn't quite this high in points leagues.

PHIL RICCI, F - SAC

GLEN RICE, SF - LAC

Rice is getting old, and is going the way of some other recent athletic sharpshooters (Dan Majerle, Reggie Miller, Steve Smith) who one day woke up considerably less athletic than they once were. Rice still shoots the 3 about as well as anyone in the league, but his productivity in almost every other category has fallen off significantly. Injuries also are becoming more of a factor, and Rice's defense (such as it is) won't help him earn playing time on a Jeff Van Gundy squad.

CLIFFORD ROBINSON, F/C - GS

Robinson, who turns 37 in December, is on the way down. His scoring, rebounding and shooting numbers last season were among the worst of his career. That said, bouncing back with Golden State is hardly out of the question. His game is better suited to the Western Conference, the Warriors need plenty of help, and Robinson still brings a nice array of statistics to the table. But his value plummets in points leagues or if he doesn't qualify at center.

GLENN ROBINSON, SF - PHI

The Big Dog generally puts up big numbers, but sometimes he is more trouble than he is worth. Robinson has averaged at least 20.0 points and 6.0 rebounds in each of the last four seasons, but he has missed 29 games in the last two and his game-to-game inconsistency was at an all-time high last season. Still, he is an asset in most categories, and his field-goal percentage should bounce back with Allen Iverson creating more open shots for him.

RODNEY ROGERS, PF - NJN

Rogers can play either forward spot and is as comfortable running the floor as he is going with the flow of a halfcourt offense. So why didn't he fare better in his first season in New Jersey? Hard to say. But Rogers did have a few productive stretches, and seemed to mesh better with his teammates as last season wore on. They will be tough to come by, but he needs more minutes to give his owners anything more than marginal reserve value.

JALEN ROSE, G/F - CHI

Rose runs hot and cold, and his shooting percentages can be ugly. But he does plenty to make up for it, including flourishing in four categories. Even if he must sacrifice some scoring as the Bulls' youngsters mature, the team's improved balance and inside play should help bolster Rose's percentages—a better-than-even trade.

MALIK ROSE, F - SA

Rose gets the absolute max out of his abilities, but the bottom line is he is a 6-7 power forward. That will get you only so far in this league, let alone this team—which features a starting front line (plus a backup swing forward) of players who all stand 6-10 or taller. Rose will earn minutes because he brings energy and toughness (plus scoring, rebounding and a nice free-throw clip), but the Spurs' changes prevent him from being even a borderline fantasy option any longer.

BRYON RUSSELL, G/F - LAL

Russell figures to be the Wizards' starting small forward, and though he'll miss playing with John Stockton and Karl Malone, he still should be relatively productive. He offers a little bit in every category, but his most significant contributions will be points, rebounds and 3-pointers. He missed a good chunk of games last season because of a hip fracture and has had a few injury problems in the past, but he isn't what you would call injury-prone. FANTASY SPIN: Russell is a pretty good sleeper, because he never has been anything more than a No. 3 option -- and usually a No. 4 -- on some pretty good Jazz teams. He might boost his numbers in Washington, where he will be counted on more heavily.

JOE SMITH, PF - MIL

There are no two ways about it: Smith's career has been a disappointment, but you shouldn't let that keep you from making him a very late pick to fill a reserve forward spot. His scoring and rebounding are halfway decent, his shooting percentages are very strong, and he'll likely be asked to carry more of the load this season. Smith's productivity tailed off at the end of the season, though, so pay close attention to what He is up to before your draft.

LATRELL SPREWELL, G/F - MIN

Sprewell was a bad fit in New York, where he played out of position. Even so, he was quite good in four categories, held his own in most others and has shown the capacity to put up better numbers than he managed last season. A trade to Minnesota might keep him from scoring as he has in the past, but it should help his percentages and perhaps inspire him to refocus on his defense, which once put Sprewell among the most productive players at his position in steals and blocks.

JERRY STACKHOUSE, G/F - WAS

Stackhouse's fantasy stock has taken a dive in the past two years; his scoring and 3-point shooting have tanked in a big way. He still is an explosive scorer, a good free throw shooter and a nice source of assists from the shooting guard spot. But will Michael Jordan's retirement open the door for Stack to fatten up his numbers again--or just make it harder?

PEJA STOJAKOVIC, SF - SAC

Health always is an issue for Stojakovic (75 games is his career high for a single season), but his shooting stroke isn't. Sure, his 3-point percentage was down a tad last year, but his total 3s were a career high and his scoring average and other percentages were in line with his best work. His injuries have been minor, and the Kings are one of the most stable situations in the league, so Stojakovic is a relatively safe pick.

AMARE STOUDEMIRE, PF - PHO

Stoudemire peaked in February and seemed a little pooped over the last two months, but it's tough to argue with his selection as the league's rookie of the year. What's next? Fantasy MVP? First, he'll have to address that nasty free-throw percentage, which is a drag on his fantasy owners because he makes so many trips to the line (among the NBA's top 25 attempt leaders, only Shaq's percentage was worse). Three-point range and a few more assists would be nice, too, but we'd settle for steady progress. Stoudemire had offseason laser surgery to improve his vision. Move him up the ranks in points leagues, especially if he qualifies at center.

MIKE SWEETNEY, PF - NYK

Sweetney stands just 6-8, but he plays bigger (witness his 3.2 blocks per game as a junior at Georgetown) and is as strong as an ox. Even if Sweetney is literally half as productive in the NBA as he was in college, he will be a solid five-category reserve. It might take time, but Sweetney looks like he could pull off a pretty decent Elton Brand impersonation. Draft him late in points leagues, but wait on him to produce in roto formats.

STROMILE SWIFT, F/C - MEM

Swift can be maddeningly inconsistent and has been injured too often for a young buck, but he is a tantalizing talent. He averaged 12.1 points, 6.7 rebounds and 1.7 blocks and shot over 50 percent after the All-Star break last season. When he is on his game, he is a five-category force. Bump up his ranking in points leagues and if he qualifies at center.

WALLY SZCZERBIAK, G/F - MIN

Szczerbiak is among the NBA's best shooters, and his percentages reflect that. Most of his other numbers are at least solid, but it's worth considering what effect the Timberwolves' offseason changes could have on his scoring. Even if his numbers dip, Szczerbiak should remain an above-average starting option. Last season's toe injury looks like a fluke, not the start of a trend.

SZYMON SZEWCZYK, PF - MIL

MAURICE TAYLOR, PF - HOU

Taylor isn't a bad player when healthy, but he gets hurt every year (95 games missed in five seasons) and he has some pretty serious drawbacks in roto leagues. His scoring and field-goal shooting are big pluses when he is 100 percent, and is below average in every other category (even his rebounding, which is poor for a power forward). He might merit a starting spot in deep points leagues, but in general he should be drafted as a deep reserve with decent upside.

ETAN THOMAS, F/C - WAS

He has become something of a forgotten man, but Thomas was a double-double machine at Syracuse, and he was productive on the rare occasions he got significant playing time last season. His role will expand this season -- he might even start -- and it's not out of the question for him to put up Dale Davis-type numbers.

KENNY THOMAS, F - PHI

Philly committed to Thomas to the tune of a seven-year contract, which means the team expects him to play a starring role (or at least a strong supporting one). He has demonstrated that, if used properly, he can be a good scorer-rebounder with good shooting percentages despite his 6-7 height. There is no good reason Thomas can't be a top 75 roto player, as he was after the All-Star break last season.

KURT THOMAS, F/C - NYK

Thomas gets worn down, and his percentages probably suffer because he is the Knicks' only proven low-post threat. But that also ensures him lots of minutes and touches. Thomas set career highs in scoring, blocks, steals and assists in 2002-03. He is getting a bit long in the tooth, but expect similar numbers this season.

TIM THOMAS, F - MIL

Though he set career highs in scoring and rebounding last season, Thomas continues to disappoint. He didn't take charge the way the Bucks had hoped after the team traded away Glenn Robinson and handed Thomas his starting job. At 6-10, he is a limited and reluctant inside player, which puts a crimp in his rebounding, field-goal shooting and blocks. Still, he delivered positive value in every category but assists last season and cracked the top 100. That's worth a prominent reserve spot in any league.

NIKOLAZ TSKITISHVILI, F - DEN

It was well known that Tskitishvili would be quite raw as a rookie, but it was a surprise that Denver didn't play last year's No. 5 overall pick more often in what was a rebuilding season from the start. At any rate, he made slow progress last year but bulked up some in the offseason and enjoyed something of a breakthrough in summer play. He still isn't NBA ready just yet, but he could be a poor man's Dirk Nowitzki once he is.

Injuries and inconsistent playing time have stunted Turkoglu's progress in the NBA, but this season could be a breakout year for him. His trade to the Spurs virtually assures him of 30 minutes a game, during which he could be at least moderately productive in five categories.

IME UDOKA, SF - LAL

KEITH VAN HORN, F - NYK

Van Horn hasn't lived up to expectations, but neither has he played as bad as some think. Playing with Allen Iverson kept him from maximizing his scoring ability, but he has positive value in five categories and should score more in New York. Can he handle the pressure there? Before the middle rounds, let someone else take that chance. If Van Horn is still hanging around after the top 25 or so forwards are gone, grab him.

ANTOINE WALKER, F - BOS

Walker is certifiably studly in some formats (usually in points leagues), but the penalty of his turnovers and awful shooting percentages outweigh the reward of his scoring, rebounding, 3s and assists in most leagues. Many of his numbers took a turn for the worse last season, but he has shown he is capable of better. Expect him to bounce back.

JERMAINE WALKER, F - ORL

SAMAKI WALKER, F/C - MIA

Walker isn't great by any stretch, but he is a good rebounder and an efficient scorer. Because he likely would fill in for Shaquille O'Neal if the big man isn't healthy -- a distinct possibility -- Walker could be worth a late grab in deep leagues or an in-season pickup. Play him at center if you can.

BEN WALLACE, F/C - DET

Wallace is a fantasy oddball, but his owners love him for it. He arguably is the best in the biz for rebounds and blocks, and his steals average was second best among the league's centers last season. He is almost no help in points, assists or 3s, and his free throw shooting is pretty awful. But unlike Shaq, Big Ben doesn't go to the line often, so his percentages won't kill you. Downgrade him a tad in points leagues or if he qualifies only at forward.

RASHEED WALLACE, PF - POR

Think of Wallace as Antoine Walker with a bow tie and pocket protector. You don't get the free-wheeling dime dropping and 3-point explosions, but you do get a reliable scorer-rebounder who provides strong defensive numbers and a 3-point touch from a power spot, all with a minimum of turnovers. Plus, 'Sheed has toned down the technicals, and he might even qualify at center.

There are two reasons C-Spoon should still be on your radar: 1) He is an excellent rebounder and can be productive in other categories in the right situation, and 2) his current situation could change. It wouldn't be a big surprise to see him traded, and he's in line for more minutes and a bigger role in the offense now that Antonio McDyess is hurt. He might even play some small forward while Latrell Sprewell is out.

CHRIS WEBBER, PF - SAC

FANTASY SPIN: Webber is a monster, a genuine first-round fantasy talent—when he is healthy. And that's a caveat of which fantasy buyers must beware. Webber annually misses at least a handful of games (43 in the last two years) and last season left the playoffs early because of a knee injury. His shooting percentages last year were some of the worst of his career, but expect those to climb—if he stays healthy. Keep an eye on his status as the season approaches.

Wells must become more consistent and clean up his 3-point stroke to get back into top 50 territory. He has seven-category ability, but he took a step back last season and is in danger of being stuck as a second-rate option.

RODNEY WHITE, G/F - DEN

White has worn out the patience of most NBA folks who were in his corner, so it's a good thing that last season he started to show what he is capable of. He has forward size and guard skills, but he hasn't been able to consistently take advantage of the combination. The potential is there, though, making him a decent sleeper. White likely will start at shooting guard this season, and his scoring, rebounding, assists and 3s should make him a decent reserve in most leagues.

CHRIS WILCOX, PF - LAC

Wilcox is coming off a strong summer league season and many Clippers observers think one of new coach Mike Dunleavy's top priorities this season should be getting the second-year forward more minutes. But Wilcox still isn't close to a finished product, and the man in front of him on the depth chart--Elton Brand--is the Clips' most valuable player. Wilcox easily could double most of his rookie numbers, and he is a late option in deep keeper leagues. But he probably will have little value again this season.

ERIC WILLIAMS, SF - BOS

Williams hasn't been the same since suffering a devastating knee injury five years ago. He's a bit player now, but he has a little value in deeper points leagues. His poor shooting from the floor mostly offsets any good he does for your points, rebounds and steals in category leagues. Also, Kedrick Brown is on the rise, so Williams figures to see his minutes cut -- perhaps drastically -- any day now.

GEORGE WILLIAMS, F - TOR

JEROME WILLIAMS, F - TOR

Williams is an odd player--small for such an effective rebounder and big for a guy who runs the floor so well--but he is a good fit in Toronto. He also is a nice asset in most fantasy leagues. He shoots a high percentage from the field and he is one of the top per-minute performers in rebounds and steals, which makes playing time a key. He earned 33 minutes per game in '02-03, and should be around that figure again this season. Just be aware of his deficiencies: free throws and (for a power player) blocks.

CORLISS WILLIAMSON, PF - DET

Williamson, a 6-7 power forward, has limitations on the floor and in fantasy play. His shooting percentages are surprisingly high, but his rebounding and blocks are substandard for a power player and his 3-point shooting and steals are strikes against him. Williamson isn't a bad reserve, especially in points leagues, but his playing time could take a hit with the emergence of Mehmet Okur and Tayshaun Prince and the arrival of Darko Milicic.

VINCENT YARBROUGH, G/F - DEN

Yarbrough is an on-the-fringe player who could carve out a niche in Denver and turn in decent reserve value in fantasy leagues, or get left behind in the Nuggets' ever-evolving rebuilding plan. Yarbrough's game is a little of this and a little of that, but a lot of nothing. He simply doesn't stand out in any area. Denver's talent level has improved since last season, so a strong start will be imperative for Yarbrough to secure a role. He isn't draft-worthy in most leagues, but watch him to see if he merits a waiver-wire pickup in season.

VIN BAKER, F/C - BOS

Baker clearly has some personal issues to work out before he can become an impact player again--and that doesn't even count his struggles to keep his weight down. Still, if Shawn Kemp can return from the brink to be a serviceable NBA center, why can't Baker, arguably a more skilled player? If he can, Baker will provide scoring, rebounding, a solid field-goal percentage and, at his best, blocks.

TONY BATTIE, F/C - BOS

By now, it's clear: Battie, the No. 5 pick in the 1997 draft, is nothing special. That doesn't mean, however, that he is without value. In fact, he's a solid No. 2 fantasy center in many leagues. If offseason knee surgery isn't a lingering problem (it isn't expected to be), Battie will be good for field-goal shooting, blocks and rebounding, in that order. And for a big guy, his free throw shooting is a bonus.

CALVIN BOOTH, C - SEA

Booth might look like a $34-million bust, but despite having health issues throughout his career -- last year he missed most of the season because of an ankle injury -- he still could have value in fantasy leagues. If he stays healthy, he'll rebound, block shots and perhaps score enough to be a very good backup. But he's best avoided in the drafts of all but the deepest leagues.

CARLOS BOOZER, F/C - CLE

Thought to be too small, too soft and too inconsistent to succeed in the NBA, he played himself into a starting role as a rookie—albeit with the hard-up Cavs. But a job is a job, and Boozer performs his well enough, delivering in the big-man categories and throwing in a nice free throw clip.

CURTIS BORCHARDT, C - UTH

Borchardt's offense needs polish, but he might be the man who ends the Jazz's seemingly unending search for a competent center. Greg Ostertag and Jarron Collins aren't exactly insurmountable obstacles, so if Borchardt plays sound defense, rebounds and scores a little in the post -- all of which he's capable of doing at this level -- he'll earn enough time to be worth a backup slot in some leagues.

SHAWN BRADLEY, C - DAL

Bradley showed more spunk last season--especially early on--than he had in years, but it still wasn't enough to turn him into a viable fantasy option in most leagues. The Mavs need more bulk against the West's big centers, and they have Dirk Nowitzki and Raef LaFrentz when they want to go small. Even in limited time, Bradley's blocks are a big asset and if his situation improves, his scoring, rebounding and shooting could help make a difference.

KWAME BROWN, F/C - WAS

Brown, the No. 1 overall pick out of high school in 2001, has been labeled a bust, but he could be ready to bust out. Michael Jordan and Doug Collins rode him hard the last two seasons, and a more positive atmosphere could be just what he needs. At any rate, Brown will get what else he needs--playing time--to succeed. He figures to start, play at least 30 minutes a game and be the Wizards' first offensive option on the low block. That should give him at least top reserve value in standard leagues.

MARCUS CAMBY, F/C - DEN

With Camby, it's pretty much all or nothing for fantasy owners. If he is healthy, he easily can be a top 100 player--especially in category leagues. But if his body gets cranky (and that can be often), he can miss lots of games and play like a ghost in those he doesn't. At his best, he is a good to excellent scorer, rebounder and shot blocker who can put up a nice shooting percentage from the field. Just don't count on him for much.

ELDEN CAMPBELL, F/C - DET

Campbell has been in a fantasy (and career) freefall since the second half of the 2001-02 season. His play long has depended on his fluctuating motivation level, and at 35, his skills might be in decline. The Pistons are high on Mehmet Okur, and Ben Wallace will play some center as well. At his best, Campbell scores, rebounds and blocks shots, but it probably would take an injury or two to turn him into a viable fantasy option again.

TYSON CHANDLER, F/C - CHI

Chandler is a long way from fulfilling his fantasy potential, but a small breakthrough is possible this season. Though his strength and free throw shooting need more work, he averaged a near double-double and 1.9 blocks after the All-Star break last season. He is more valuable if he qualifies at center in your league, but if he continues to develop, he will be a solid reserve even as a forward.

ERIC CHENOWITH, C - LAL

KEON CLARK, F/C - UTH

Clark regressed last season, at least in part because he received fewer minutes. He looks like a niche player, and could be overmatched as a starter on a bad Utah squad. Offensively, he has been at his best as a trailer on the break and as a sneaky putback rebounder. He isn't likely to suddenly begin creating his own offense with the Jazz. Clark has value, though, because his rebounding and blocks numbers--already decent--should improve with 6-10 more minutes per game.

Despite playing hurt much of last season, Coleman was pretty productive and -- if you can believe it -- reliable. But the left knee that bugged him has been slow to heal after surgery, and Coleman is now expected to be out until at least November. That, combined with his age (35), weight and attitude, should make you wary of him.

EDDY CURRY, F/C - CHI

Curry was dominant over the final two months of last season, though he still needs to work on his conditioning. His low assists and steals totals don't hurt much from a center, but his rebounds and free throw shooting do. Still, he should become a starter-worthy fantasy center this season, and perhaps a star, especially in points leagues.

Dampier is coming off one of his strongest seasons, one that included a full slate of 82 games from a player who has lots of past injury issues. There isn't much upside here--Dampier has averaged between 7.4 and 8.8 points and 5.3 and 7.6 rebounds the last five seasons--but all in all he is a solid fantasy backup.

ANTONIO DAVIS, F/C - TOR

Davis is a proven double-double guy who also is good for blocks and a nice free throw clip for a power player. But injuries ruined last season for him, and playing center (he is a natural power forward) is aging him fast and dragging down his field-goal shooting. That said, if he doesn't qualify at the position in your fantasy league, he loses most of his fading luster.

DALE DAVIS, F/C - POR

Davis never was a great scorer, and his rebounding and shot blocking aren't what they used to be either. But he still does all three well enough--and will have ample opportunity to produce--that he deserves a spot on someone's roster in the majority of leagues. That might change if Davis fails to qualify at center or something (most likely a trade) unsettles his situation.

DeClerq is an effort guy who puts up decent numbers when given sufficient playing time, but who rarely gets it. The Magic are hurting for big-man help, though, so DeClerq could earn 20 or more minutes per game. He'll need all of them to have much worth to fantasy owners, but even then his value will be limited to deep points leagues.

The Kings knew Divac was slowly succumbing to age, but they didn't want to get caught with their pants down if the process suddenly went into overdrive, so they dealt for Brad Miller. Even if Divac starts, he obviously will have to give up a sizable chunk of playing time. Tack on the incremental drops that have characterized most of his numbers the last few years, and you've got a former fantasy starter who looks a lot better riding your bench. Divac simply won't get enough minutes to do what he has done for his owners in the past.

Lewis is a meat-and-potatoes fantasy player. You want premium fare? You'll have to head to Chez Wallace or Cafe Kirilenko. Need your basic scorer-rebounder with solid shooting percentages? Lewis delivers. He could raise his profile by getting his 3-point numbers back to their 2001-02 levels, but the Sonics need Lewis' inside muscle more than they did then.

TIM DUNCAN, F/C - SA

Critics of Duncan's robotic playing style and flair for the bland never owned him in a fantasy league. He is prolific, consistent, durable and--if you can believe it--still improving. Just check out his rebounds, assists, blocks and field-goal shooting numbers. Don't be surprised if he quickly addresses last season's dip in free throw percentage, though those turnovers likely aren't going away.

FRANCISCO ELSON, C - DEN

MELVIN ELY, C - LAC

Ely made strides in the second half of his rookie season, and after the reconfiguration of the Clippers' roster, he now figures to have more opportunities--perhaps as the team's starting center. He is a tad undersized, though, and still will be fairly low on the totem pole of offensive options. If Ely can hold off rookie Chris Kaman and play well enough to keep Mike Dunleavy from playing Elton Brand at center, he could turn in solid numbers in all the big-man categories.

JEFF FOSTER, F/C - IND

Foster would have decent minutes if he got significant minutes -- he's a rock-solid rebounder, and his other numbers aren't bad -- but he's behind Brad Miller on the depth chart and might have to scrounge for the leftover minutes with the Pacers' other Foster (Greg).

ADONAL FOYLE, C - GS

Foyle probably is one of the least skilled offensive players in an NBA rotation, but he has fantasy value because he is among the league's most efficient shooters and best per-minute shot blockers and rebounders. Foyle needs more minutes to move up, and his limitations probably will keep that from happening. But he is on the verge of top 100 status in category leagues, which makes him a rock-solid reserve center.

BRIAN GRANT, F/C - MIA

Grant is an excellent rebounder and one tough dude, but he simply isn't big enough to take the nightly pounding as an NBA center. The good news is that he should qualify at the position in fantasy leagues--his value drops precipitously if he can be used only at forward. Grant has the potential to offer positive value in five categories, but the Heat will have to get him some help in the frontcourt first.

HORACE GRANT, F/C - LAL

Grant nearly retired in the offseason, so he clearly is near the end. If he manages to keep the wheels from coming off in his 16th season, he could be a decent backup in deep leagues -- especially if in your league he qualifies at center, where he actually plays for Orlando.

BRENDAN HAYWOOD, C - WAS

Depending on how you look at it, Haywood either is a career underachiever or a guy for whom expectations were too high to begin with. He can help in the rebounds, blocks and field-goal percentage categories, but so can several dozen other NBA centers. Haywood never will be a game changer, and it isn't even likely he will improve upon his numbers from his first two seasons much.

ALAN HENDERSON, F/C - ATL

Injuries have plagued Henderson since the 1999-2000 season, when he played 82 games and put up career numbers. He's stuck behind Shareef Abdur-Rahim, and he isn't exactly a fantasy prize when he does get a lot of floor time -- his scoring and rebounding can be assets, but the rest of his stats are average or worse.

NENE HILARIO, F/C - DEN

Hilario was better in points leagues last season because his shooting percentages and turnovers hurt him quite a bit in most roto formats. He should make the usual strides of a second-year player, and his percentages in particular could make a nice upswing if Marcus Camby can stay healthy and give the Nuggets another post presence for defenses to deal with. It's worth knowing Hilario was among the league leaders in steals--an oddity for a big man, and a bonus for his owners.

Ilgauskas finally overcame injury problems and played a full season in 2002-03, putting up solid numbers in the process. Trouble is, he still is an injury risk, and his rebounding and field-goal shooting are subpar for a center. Ilgauskas also might take a step back if others (Dajuan Wagner, LeBron James) step up.

JEROME JAMES, C - SEA

James has been an overachiever, but he is nothing special as a fantasy player. The Sonics have no fewer than four other players on the roster who can handle themselves at center -- all of them with a better upside than James. But because he is penciled in as the starter and has great size and bulk (and as a result figures to play plenty against the Shaqs and Olowokandis in the West), he has to be considered with a late pick in some drafts.

LaFrentz does things other good big men do (score, rebound, block shots), but he also knocks down 3s, which makes him particularly valuable in category leagues. Still, LaFrentz has to be on the floor to display those skills, and he saw his minutes dwindle last season as the Mavs slowly began to realize he was a poor fit. He might still be traded, which would be the best thing for his fantasy value.

TODD MACCULLOCH, C - PHI

It's hard to tell whether MacCulloch will benefit or lose out as a result of his trade from New Jersey. On the one hand, a move from the run-and-gun Nets to the halfcourt-heavy Sixers should suit his plodding style better. But will he get as many shots -- or get as many easy looks no longer playing with Jason Kidd -- in Philly? He should be fine, because he figures to get more minutes and many of his points come off offensive rebounds. There'll be plenty of those in Iverson country.

Magloire came on strong after the All-Star break (10.7 ppg, 6.3 rpg, 1.3 bpg) last year, and might be close to taking Elden Campbell's starting job. He seems destined to post his second-half averages -- and perhaps better -- over a full season. He's good insurance if you also have Campbell, but Magloire will have value in most leagues regardless.

BRAD MILLER, C - SAC

Miller struggled with injuries last season, which contributed to a second half statistical slide. He isn't exactly injury-prone, but he hasn't been a picture of health during his career. When he is healthy, Miller is an asset in four categories.

OLIVER MILLER, C - IND

YAO MING, C - HOU

Nothing but upside here. Yao likely fatigued down the stretch of his rookie season, but his second-half improvement in six of our eight fantasy categories is all the more reason to love him. Imagine a stronger, better conditioned, wiser Yao in an offense tailored to make the most of him. Scary, huh? He'll shine in the typical big-man categories, but he also is an exceptional free throw shooter and has the potential to deliver more assists.

NAZR MOHAMMED, F/C - ATL

There is no telling whether Theo Ratliff will stay healthy, but much of Mohammed's fantasy value depends on it. If Ratliff misses a lot of time -- as he has the last four seasons -- Mohammed will be forced to play a ton of minutes, which isn't the worst thing that could happen. Mohammed is a good scorer and rebounder who shoots pretty well from the field. But he blocks very few shots for a center, and his playing time could be in question all year.

ALONZO MOURNING, C - NJN

Mourning is a potential bust who missed all of last season. His kidney ailment could sideline him for good at any point, and he may not fit in with the uptempo Nets (Uh, remember Dikembe?). But he is the right guy to take a risk on. With any luck, Zo will be a force in four categories. If all goes well, he could be among fantasy's top five true centers.

DIKEMBE MUTOMBO, C - NYK

Mutombo's supposed offensive enlightenment a few years ago never really took, but he's still among the best fantasy centers because of his rebounding and shot blocking. Just remember, he's a bad fit for the Nets' offense and, at 36, has worn a lot of tread off those tires.

RADOSLAV NESTEROVIC, C - SA

Nesterovic is a decent player with some upside, though he wouldn't be on this list if he weren't a center and weren't so darn reliable. He has missed only a handful of games in his career, and his numbers steadily have improved. If anything, playing alongside Tim Duncan should only help.

DIRK NOWITZKI, F/C - DAL

Clear-cut top picks are rare, but Nowitzki comes close. He scores, rebounds and blocks shots, but he sets himself apart with his 3s and assists—premium categories for a big man. The deeper the scoring format, the more valuable Nowitzki becomes. (His turnover totals are surprisingly low.) You're loopy if you consider anyone else at No. 1—unless Nowitzki doesn't qualify at center in your league.

IKE NWANKWO, C - CLE

JERMAINE O'NEAL, F/C - IND

O'Neal is a prototypical All-Star power forward: a 20-10 guy who ranks among the league leaders in field-goal accuracy and blocks. What makes O'Neal even more special is that he qualifies at center in most leagues, and his other numbers—those rarely associated with big men—are on the upswing. He'll never be a Nowitzki-esque outside shooter, but this season could be the first in which he turns in positive fantasy value in assists, steals and free throws.

SHAQUILLE O'NEAL, C - LAL

If Shaq could stay healthy and in shape—and could hit just one more free throw attempt per game—he would be the undisputed No. 1 pick in fantasy drafts everywhere. Fat chance. O'Neal is awesome in no fewer than five categories, but he now must be considered an annual injury risk after missing 15 games for the second straight season. And because he takes so many free throws, his poor performance at the line is an enormous drag on his value. He still is an elite fantasy center, though, and a potential top pick in points leagues.

MEHMET OKUR, F/C - DET

Okur ranked among the top 30 fantasy centers over the second half of last season despite coming off the bench until the last two weeks. He is expected to start in 2003-04, and though his playing time can be affected by his tendency to get into foul trouble, he offers production in premium categories—3s and blocks—at a premium position.

MICHAEL OLOWOKANDI, C - MIN

Olowokandi appeared to be on his way to a breakout 2002-03 season before he was slowed and eventually sidelined by a knee injury that required surgery. He reportedly is 100 percent again, and he could be a beast now that he's out of the Clippers' run-and-gun attack and into the Timberwolves' halfcourt-heavy, motion offense. At the very least, expect top-notch rebounding and blocks numbers, and with any luck the Kandi Man's scoring and field-goal shooting will follow.

GREG OSTERTAG, C - UTH

Ostertag is no fantasy prize, but owners know what they're getting: rebounding, blocks and a solid field-goal clip. They also know what not to expect: points, assists, steals and decent free-throw shooting. With the complete overhaul of the Jazz, Ostertag has a chance to move up this season, but he generally isn't worth drafting.

BO OUTLAW, F/C - MEM

Outlaw probably will have little value unless someone gets hurt, but because Tom Gugliotta is an injury waiting to happen, he must be considered in deep leagues. Outlaw never has been a double-digit scorer, but his field-goal percentage always ranks among the league leaders, and his rebounding, steals and blocks are a factor.

THEO RATLIFF, F/C - ATL

It will be a long time before Ratliff can shake his rep as an injury risk, but playing 81 games last season was a start. He led the league in blocks and took care of business on the boards. The next step is getting his scoring and shooting back to their levels of a few years ago. His value isn't quite this high in points leagues.

ZELJKO REBRACA, C - DET

Rebraca, a Yugoslavian who made his NBA debut as a 29-year-old last season, was like few rookies in the league's recent history. He came in with a refined offensive game, excellent touch for a big man and effective, if not gifted, rebounding skills. Unless Rodney White breaks out this season, Rebraca should earn more minutes and be even more productive.

ERIC RILEY, C - SA

STANLEY ROBERTS, C - TOR

CLIFFORD ROBINSON, F/C - GS

Robinson, who turns 37 in December, is on the way down. His scoring, rebounding and shooting numbers last season were among the worst of his career. That said, bouncing back with Golden State is hardly out of the question. His game is better suited to the Western Conference, the Warriors need plenty of help, and Robinson still brings a nice array of statistics to the table. But his value plummets in points leagues or if he doesn't qualify at center.

ARVYDAS SABONIS, C - POR

Yes, friends, the big man is back. But Sabonis' chronically injured knees didn't grow 10 years younger in the year he has been away from the NBA, so he can't be expected to be any more of a contributor than he was in the past. Considering he is nearly 38 and averaged 59 games in his last three years in Portland, he is a backup center at best.

STROMILE SWIFT, F/C - MEM

Swift can be maddeningly inconsistent and has been injured too often for a young buck, but he is a tantalizing talent. He averaged 12.1 points, 6.7 rebounds and 1.7 blocks and shot over 50 percent after the All-Star break last season. When he is on his game, he is a five-category force. Bump up his ranking in points leagues and if he qualifies at center.

ETAN THOMAS, F/C - WAS

He has become something of a forgotten man, but Thomas was a double-double machine at Syracuse, and he was productive on the rare occasions he got significant playing time last season. His role will expand this season -- he might even start -- and it's not out of the question for him to put up Dale Davis-type numbers.

KURT THOMAS, F/C - NYK

Thomas gets worn down, and his percentages probably suffer because he is the Knicks' only proven low-post threat. But that also ensures him lots of minutes and touches. Thomas set career highs in scoring, blocks, steals and assists in 2002-03. He is getting a bit long in the tooth, but expect similar numbers this season.

JAKE TSAKALIDIS, C - MEM

Tsakalidis was hindered most of last season by a back injury, and his playing time in the future might be sporadic because he'll have trouble keeping up with the rest of the Suns' jet-propelled lineup. Still, when healthy, Tsakalidis has shown the potential to be an impact scorer-rebounder-shot blocker. Not a great one, mind you, but a relatively productive one. That would make some fantasy owners looking to fill a bench spot perfectly happy.

SAMAKI WALKER, F/C - MIA

Walker isn't great by any stretch, but he is a good rebounder and an efficient scorer. Because he likely would fill in for Shaquille O'Neal if the big man isn't healthy -- a distinct possibility -- Walker could be worth a late grab in deep leagues or an in-season pickup. Play him at center if you can.

BEN WALLACE, F/C - DET

Wallace is a fantasy oddball, but his owners love him for it. He arguably is the best in the biz for rebounds and blocks, and his steals average was second best among the league's centers last season. He is almost no help in points, assists or 3s, and his free throw shooting is pretty awful. But unlike Shaq, Big Ben doesn't go to the line often, so his percentages won't kill you. Downgrade him a tad in points leagues or if he qualifies only at forward.

LORENZEN WRIGHT, C - MEM

Wright is coming off a difficult year. He was hit by injuries again last season (he has averaged fewer than 63 games since his rookie year), and suffered a personal tragedy. Now the Grizzlies are talking bluntly about their need to upgrade at the center spot. With Stromile Swift on the rise and Pau Gasol entrenched as the team's power forward, Wright might be headed for the bench. He delivers scoring and rebounding when healthy and playing starter minutes, but his field-goal shooting and blocks are subpar for a big man.
